SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE

MONDAY, MAY 6, 1935

(Legislative day of Wednesday, May 1, 1935)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

DEATH OF SENATOR BRONSON CUTTING, OF NEW MEXICO

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise to announce, with extreme regret, that a terrible accident has occurred this morning in which my colleague the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] has lost his life. I am informed he had been in New Mexico, called there by important business, and was returning by airplane in order that he might be at his post of duty this afternoon. He was tremendously interested in matters which were to come before the Senate today, and I know he was exerting every effort to be here, in order to participate in the proceedings which were to have been had. In his loyalty to duty he lost his life.

Later I shall ask permission to make extended remarks concerning the life and character of Senator CUTTING. For the present, I will content myself with saying that he has carved for himself a conspicuous and honored place in the affairs of the Nation, as well as of my State, and his untimely and tragic death is a loss to America, as well as to New Mexico.

I send to the desk a resolution which I ask to have read and to have considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 130) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. Bronson CUTTING, late a Senator from the State of New Mexico.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed as the committee provided for under the second resolution the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN].

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator, I move that the Senate do now stand adjourned.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, May 7, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MAY 6, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend Simpson B. Daugherty, D. D., of the National Memorial United Brethren Church, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O God, our Father, we thank Thee that in the time of our deepest need and in the time when we seek to rise to triumph and success in the realm of statesmanship and legislation Thou dost point the way; Thou dost give us the consciousness of Thy presence in all that we undertake to do, and we pray that this session shall be to Thy glory and each one of us shall be found in the way of Thy choosing. Bless him who presides and all who have a part in the affairs of our Nation. And in His name we ask it. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, May 4, 1935, was read and approved.

COTTON PROCESSING TAX

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, on April 10, 1935, the General Assembly of North Carolina memorialized Congress to repeal the processing tax on cotton.

On May 3, 1935, this action was reconsidered by the North Carolina Legislature, and they have now sent us another memorial, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the memorial.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution repealing, rescinding, and vacating Resolution No. 37, House Resolution No. 1040, ratified April 10, 1935, entitled "A joint resolution memorializing Congress to eliminate the cotton-processing tax"

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring):

SECTION 1. That House Resolution No. 1040, ratified April 10, 1935, be, and the same is hereby, in all respects repealed, rescinded, and vacated as fully to all intents and purposes as if said resolution had never been introduced, passed, and/or ratified.

SEC. 2. That copies of this resolution be transmitted by the secretary of state of North Carolina to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of North Carolina.

SEC. 3. That this resolution shall be in full force and effect from and after its ratification.

ELIMINATION OF GRADE CROSSINGS

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the elimination of grade crossings and to include therein letters which I have written to the Governor of the State of New York, the mayor of the city of New York, the State highway department and the transit commission, and their replies thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the elimination of grade crossings, with particular reference to those of the Long Island Railroad on Atlantic Avenue in Brooklyn and Queens, and to include therein letters which I have sent to Governor Lehman and Mayor La Guardia, the State highway department, and the Transit Commission of New York, and their replies thereto.

The following letter was sent to the Honorable Herbert H. Lehman, Governor, Albany, New York; Hon. Fiorello H. LaGuardia, mayor, Manhattan, New York City; State highway department, Albany, N. Y., transit commission, 270 Madison Avenue, New York City:

APRIL 15, 1935.

I respectfully ask that application be made to the Secretary of Agriculture (Bureau of Roads, Mr. Thomas MacDonald), Washington, D. C., for allocation of funds to meet the cost of the Atlantic Avenue grade crossings elimination on the Long Island Railroad in the Boroughs of Brooklyn and Queens and Long Island. This application, in my opinion, should be made for a grant of money outright. My reasons for this are as follows:

For years the people of Brooklyn and Queens and Long Island, realizing the existing hazards to life at railroad grade crossings, have advocated their elimination.

Under the existing law the expense would have to be borne by the State of New York, the city of New York, and the Long Island and Nassau Railroads. Because of complications involved, a long-drawn-out court litigation would probably ensue.

In January 1935 a questionnaire was sent out, by direction of the Public Works Administration at Washington, by Mr. Arthur S. Tuttle, State engineer of the Public Works Administration in New York City, to the State of New York and its municipalities for contemplated and tentative improvements. The Atlantic Avenue improvement was among those contemplated. No formal, definite, and specific application for money for the Atlantic Avenue improvement was made, however.

Now that the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, approved April 8, 1935, is law, formal application must be made for the necessary funds to be allocated for this much-needed improvement.

Everything that has been done so far is purely tentative in its nature. I therefore again ask the Governor of the State of New York, the State highway department, the mayor of the city of New York, and the transit commission to join hands in making this application for the grant of funds by the Federal Government.

As the Long Island Railroad is routed for a great distance on Atlantic Avenue in the Boroughs of Brooklyn and Queens, in my congressional district, you can readily understand my great interest in this matter.

I hope this application is speedily made so that I may do all that I can with the authorities in Washington for the allocation of this money.

I am making this request to the Governor of the State of New York, the State highway department, the mayor of the city of New York, and the transit commission.

Sincerely yours,

STEPHEN A. RUDD.

STATE OF NEW YORK, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Albany, April 23, 1935.

Hon. STEPHEN A. RUDD,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN RUDD: This is in reply to your letter of April 15 to Governor Lehman.

I am advised by the department of public service that the State of New York is preparing promptly to utilize all the funds which the Federal Government will place at the disposal of the State for grade-crossing eliminations. It is understood that the President will soon announce the rules regarding the apportionment and utilization of funds and the bureau or department at Washington which will have charge of the matter. As soon as these points have been determined, the State of New York will be in a position to act promptly and your suggestion will be carefully considered in connection therewith.

Very sincerely yours,

WALTER T. BROWN.

CITY OF NEW YORK, OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
April 16, 1935.

Hon. STEPHEN A. RUDD,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: I have yours of the 15th. As you know, I have already taken first steps to see that New York City gets some of the grade-crossing funds and that all doesn't go to the rural districts, as has been the custom heretofore. I have assurance that we will get our share.

When you are next in the city I will be glad to talk the matter over with you. If you have anything in mind specifically, I would suggest that you submit the location to Col. Frederick S. Greene, State superintendent of public works.

Kindest regards, sincerely yours,

F. H. LA GUARDIA, Mayor.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS,
Albany, N. Y., April 17, 1935.

Hon. STEPHEN A. RUDD,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have your letter of April 15 relative to the elimination of the Atlantic Avenue grade crossing in the Boroughs of Brooklyn and Queens.

The President has made no allocation for either highway or grade-crossing elimination work under section 5 of the Unemployment Relief Act. When this allocation is made I have no doubt that a certain sum of money will be allocated to the city of New York for grade-crossing eliminations. I don't know whether that work will be handled by this department or by the transit commission. Until such time, however, as the President does make an allocation to this State no allocation can be made to the city of New York.

I have no idea how much the Atlantic Avenue elimination will cost, but I imagine that the cost will be much greater than the amount that can possibly be allocated to New York City, if not greater than the amount that may be allocated to the State as a whole.

It is not our understanding that there will be 100-percent grants outside of those made under section 5 for non-Federal projects, although I believe the President has the authority to make such grants if he sees fit. This department, however, can't borrow money except through a vote of the people. I believe that municipalities can and it is suggested that you get in touch with the transit commission, which has State funds available for elimination of grade crossings, and see whether or not State funds and Federal funds may be used jointly to take care of Atlantic Avenue.

Very truly yours,

A. W. BRANDT, Commissioner.

TRANSIT COMMISSION,
New York, April 16, 1935.

Hon. STEPHEN A. RUDD,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This will acknowledge the receipt of your letter of April 15, 1935, in reference to the possibility of an allocation of Federal funds to meet the cost of the Atlantic Avenue grade crossing elimination on the Long Island Railroad in the Boroughs of Brooklyn and Queens.

The possibility of securing Federal aid for this project has had the consideration of this commission for some time and conferences have been held with the president of the Borough of Brooklyn and counsel for the railroad company looking to the solution of the problems attendant upon so intricate a matter.

The Atlantic Avenue improvement was listed by the commission among other projects on the questionnaire filled out and filed with the Public Works Administration. Whether this project can be carried on with moneys allocated under the Emergency Appropriation Act of 1935 depends on whether the sum awarded to New York City for grade crossing elimination purposes will be sufficiently large and whether the city will be able to finance the related municipal improvements out of Federal funds or otherwise. Until regulations have been formulated by the Federal agencies delegated to carry out the provisions of the act and until the exact amount of the grade crossing allotment for New York City is decided, no determination can be reached as to whether the Atlantic Avenue improvement can be progressed with Federal financing.

Very truly yours,

MACK NOMBERG, Secretary.

In pursuance of the above reply from Mayor LaGuardia, on April 23 I had an interview with Messrs. Mack Nomberg and William C. Lancaster, secretary and chief engineer, respectively, of the transit commission, at 270 Madison Avenue, Manhattan; and on April 24 I had an interview with Mayor LaGuardia at the City Hall, New York City; all of the above gentlemen assured me that they would do everything they could to bring about the desired result.

THE PLIGHT OF THE COTTON-TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including therein a radio address which I delivered on Saturday evening over the Columbia Broadcasting System.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio last Saturday evening:

I want to have a heart-to-heart talk tonight with all of you who are American citizens. Whether you live in my own New England, in the boundless prairies of the great West, in the sunny South, or in the realm of the great empire that is to be—beyond the Rockies on the slopes of the Pacific Ocean. We are all Americans, of one country and of one purpose. No section can prosper without that prosperity being reflected in every other section of the land. No section can be adversely affected without affecting every other section of the country.

I come tonight to plead the cause of a distressed people. I come to ask simple justice for a people whose only request of their Government is to be permitted an opportunity to earn their livelihood in the American way through honest toil. These people for whom I speak do not want to live on a Government dole; they do not want to be an anchor on the good ship Recovery. They want to bring back happier and better days by creating rather than destroying wealth.

Three injustices have recently been inflicted by the administration upon the people for whom I speak, all of whom depend for their livelihood upon King Cotton, which for years has contributed to the wealth of the Nation.

The cotton-spinning industry is one of the oldest industries in the world. It is the second largest in the United States. When you strangle the second greatest industry in the country, that is a matter of great concern not only for the 10,000,000 who live directly or indirectly on cotton, but for everyone else as well.

The cotton industry is being choked with the cotton-processing tax, and unless relief is promptly forthcoming, drab days are ahead for the 500,000 men and women who work in these mills, both in the North and the South. No industry can permanently stand a 50-percent tax on pay rolls, which is about what this tax means to the cotton-spinning industry. Inevitably one of two things must happen: The mill closes and thousands are thrown out of work and join the great army of unemployed, who become dependent upon Government alms; or else there comes a readjustment downward of working conditions. Either would be deplorable, and I cannot believe will meet with the approval of the American people.

Now, I want it squarely understood I recognize there is a cotton crisis in the South that must be met. If the grower needs relief, give it to him. No one is going to interpose objections to this. But I believe we have a right to insist that this relief be given in a way that will not be destructive and disastrous to millions of other folks. You are never going to bring prosperity to this land by severely penalizing five people for every one you aid.

I repeat—give the southern cotton farmer a helping hand. But do not put what should be a national burden on the shoulders of an industry which has been struggling under difficulties for years and which can ill afford to bear additional burdens. Do not give this aid at the cost of throwing out of work hundreds of thousands of men and women who gain their livelihood by handling cotton in one way or another.

Do not give this aid to a part of the cotton-growing section and then make more pitiable and desperate the always pathetic life of the tenant crop farmer. Do not give this aid in a way that will put hundreds of thousands of people on the Federal-aid rolls. Lastly, do not give this help in a way which will cause other nations, notably Egypt, Brazil, and India, to increase their acreage; which will eventually mean the stabilization of the South on a 6,000,000-bale production, secured only through the aid of a protective tariff.

These are only facts, my countrymen, and in the consideration of the cotton tax it must always be remembered that cotton presents an entirely different situation than other crops. Cotton needs an export market almost as large as the home consumption if it is to be really prosperous. Other commodities will do fairly well if we give to the farmer the American market.

This Roosevelt experiment has failed; failed dismally. It has brought destitution and distress to a large part of our population. Fairness would demand a readjustment of the administration of this relief so that it will not block the return to better days.

The second grievance of the textile industry—and it is the grievance of a hundred other industries as well—is in the failure to give adequate protection against Japanese imports.

Within 40 days this year there were more textile goods imported into this country from Japan than came in during the whole 12 months of 1934. When the workers cried for protection, the President answered the imports were less than 1 percent of the output of the industry and other administration chiefs branded them as inconsequential.

It is true the total was less than 1 percent, but the President might have added that in one item, the imports embraced more than 20 percent of the volume; it might further have been said the Japanese price in every instance, regardless of the volume sold, establishes in a measure the price the American manufacturer can obtain. No seller can pass along his increased costs when he is already being undersold by a competitor, as resourceful and energetic as the Japanese.

Let us glance for a moment at the wages paid skilled workmen in Japan, the wages of the men and women who make the goods our working people are in competition with. We find for a 10-hour day the average textile worker gets 23½ cents; the worker in the metal trade, $1.45; the glass worker, 75 cents; the worker in the match industry, 23 cents; the paper maker, 40 cents; the shoe worker, 65 cents; the tailor, 60 cents; the carpenter, 65 cents; plasterer, 73 cents; masons, 87 cents; bricklayers, 80 cents; painters, 70 cents; bookbinders, 69 cents; printers, 89 cents; male domestics, 24 cents; female domestics, 23 cents. Bear in mind these figures are for daily wages, not hourly.

These figures eloquently tell the story of why we cannot expect to live if the Japanese imports are allowed to come in as they are at the present time.

The question is fairly presented to the country. There is no dodging the issue. Do we want to compel the workers in America to compete in the American market with Japanese labor which is paid from 20 to 25 cents a day? Do we want to see industry thrive in Japan while it languishes in this country?

We talk about spending billions to defend this country from a foreign foe. If we do not have the good sense to protect our own industries and to give our own people a chance to work, there need be no worry about national defense. There won't be anything here to excite the envy or the cupidity of a foreign foe.

The processing tax and the Japanese imports are not all the textile industry is obliged to worry about. We once had profitable markets in South America, Central America, and the Philippines. In 1932 we sold in South America 66,207,000 square yards of cotton goods, while last year the sales totaled 35,310,000; almost a 50-percent drop. In 1933 we sold in Central America 44,382,000 square yards, and last year only 33,499,000. The Department of Commerce reports: "The drop is mainly owing to competition from low-priced Japanese goods." Now, we could overlook this loss, even in an administration which has loud-trumpeted what it was doing to recover foreign markets. Let us turn to the Philippine Islands. In 1932 we sold to the Philippines 116,655,000 square yards of cotton piece goods; in 1933 the sales aggregated 88,087,000 square yards, and last year hit a new low of many years at 47,873,000. In this same period Japanese cotton piece goods exports rose from 24,661,520 yards in 1932 to 67,601,776 yards last year. You will not fail to note how badly we have been pushed into second place, and in a few months our trade will be negligible.

This slump in the Philippines' trade meant the loss of good jobs here for thousands of American workers, and it must be charged directly to the administration. No one else is to blame.

The Philippines were concerned at the vanishing of the American trade and they wanted to arrest the shift. They did not care to be too dependent upon Japan, and they further realized if they were to continue to sell goods in the United States they must buy some of our manufactured products. Legislation was proposed by the islanders last December which would have stopped the flood of Japanese imports. That legislation never was permitted to become a law. A message suggesting delay came from the State Department at Washington and the Philippine Legislature acquiesced. Think of that, an American official actually refusing to permit the enactment of legislation which would have increased American trade.

Months have passed. The Japanese enjoy the rich markets of the Philippines and, as the islanders become accustomed to the cheaper Japanese goods, it is going to be increasingly difficult for us to regain the markets.

These three grievances have been submitted to President Roosevelt. He has all the power necessary to give protection and justice to this great industry. One stroke of his pen and all could be adjusted. Will he aid these distressed millions? The responsibility is his. He can allow the millions engaged in the textile industry to enjoy a more abundant life if he so wishes.

Oh, my countrymen, I wish you could go with me into the homes of these mill workers, who have seen their mills closed for all time. Gloom and despair everywhere. Hope eternally vanished. Their jobs gone and no chance for new employment. They apparently face a future that means only the meager livelihood from the Government dole.

Cities and towns once prosperous are faced with mounting relief costs and decreasing revenues. Tax rates soar and the thrifty lose the homes they acquired only after years of toil. And in all this distress these municipalities struggle gamely on. They have asked very little of the Federal Government. My own State of Massachusetts has been obliged to put up more for relief than any other State in the Union.

Every Massachusetts city and town has contributed liberally for relief. One of the Federal officials has commended the Massachusetts spirit to do its part. But I sound this warning. We cannot continue. Our resources are not limitless. If these destructive policies continue, then we must unwillingly turn over the load. And, after all, if the Federal Government through its own folly and unwise experiments brings about a situation it must expect to pay.

You of the West are deeply interested in our plight. Your best customers are in these industrial cities. They consume your wheat, corn, and other agricultural products. Destroy the purchasing power in the great industrial centers and you will find your own situation will be seriously worse off. So, I repeat, this is a Nation-wide problem, and everybody is deeply concerned in having it solved right.

I cannot believe the spirit of fair play, the spirit of humane-ness, which has ever been in evidence in America, will permit these destructive policies to continue. It is because I have an unbounded faith in the people I am making this appeal to the country. Help these people or they perish.

IMPERIAL COUNCIL OF THE MYSTIC SHRINE

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 272) to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to defray certain expenses incident to the convention of the Imperial Council of the Mystic Shrine, June 8 to June 17, 1935, both inclusive.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 272

Resolved, etc., That for carrying out the provisions of Public Resolution No. 14, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved April 24, 1935, within the limitations and for the several purposes therein expressed, there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $54,000, to be payable from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE UNITED STATES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a House resolution, which the Clerk will report.

House Resolution 212

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, if agreeable to him and available, to transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives the full text or transcript of his press conference of Friday, May 3, 1935, on the resolutions of the United States Chamber of Commerce on his legislative program.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the resolution just adopted at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in presenting this resolution it is with no thought that its adoption imposes any obligation upon the part of the President to comply with it. The resolution itself asks for the text or transcript of his press conference on the resolutions of the United States Chamber of Commerce "if agreeable to him and available." It is wholly at his pleasure. If for any reason, or no reason, the text of the interview referred to is not transmitted to the Speaker of the House, it is entirely satisfactory to the author of the resolution.

My object in presenting the resolution is solely that the President may be invited, if he sees fit, to send up for the record his comment on the resolutions adopted by the United States Chamber of Commerce in convention at Washington last week, which constituted the first major offensive by the representatives of big business on his program as a whole. His comment is, of course, matter of great interest and importance.

Obviously big business thinks the zero hour has arrived for an open and general assault on the recovery and reform program. For several months now we have been treated to sporadic attacks on different features of the program, but this is the first time the big boys have gone into action all along the line.

Not only the resolutions adopted by the United States Chamber of Commerce, but the outstanding speeches of its spokesmen and leaders voice opposition to practically the whole program now pending before Congress and were evidently inspired by the belief that the time has come to go after Roosevelt in the hope of defeating him for reelection and returning to power another reactionary administration at Washington.

To show the reaction to these speeches on the part of the newspapers reporting the proceedings, I quote a few convention headlines from the Washington Post, a conservative newspaper:

United States Chamber of Commerce flays new deal on many fronts.

United States Chamber flays new deal on all fronts.

Bill by Wagner means strife, Chamber told.

Social-security measure assailed as wrong, dangerous.

Fight on new deal pressed by United States Chamber speakers.

"A. A. A. scuttling farm exports", Chamber told.

Government's meddling held bar to business.

United States Chamber spurs battle on banking bill.

Silas Strawn sees ignominious retreat in N. R. A. test cases.

Silas Strawn was formerly president of the chamber—

"Nation rejects N. R. A. and N. I. R. A." C. D. A. says.

Mr. Speaker, a column could be filled with these headings. The foregoing suffice. The text of the speeches as reported live up to the headlines, and the resolutions adopted show that the speeches truly reflect the views and sentiments of the organization.

A few brief quotations from the resolutions indicate their trend.

On the National Industrial Recovery Act:

We believe that the present law should be allowed to expire in June of this year.

The collective-bargaining provisions of the present law have definitely disproved their worth.

Labor Relations: On the 30-hour-week bill and the National Labor Relations Board, the resolutions say:

To each of these proposals the chamber is definitely opposed.

Federal Reserve System:

We urge that no change be made in the Federal Reserve Act, except such as will provide further strength and usefulness to the present plan.

Social-security legislation:

We question the propriety as well as the constitutionality of any effort by the Federal Government designed to take jurisdiction over the subject matter of this proposed legislation.

Agricultural Adjustment Act:

We oppose any further extension of governmental authority over the freedom of action of the producers, processors, or distributors of basic agricultural commodities, as provided in the proposed amendments to the A. A. A.

Enumerating all the bills.

Utility bill of 1935:

All attempts to superimpose Federal regulations of operating companies upon State regulation should be abandoned.

Examination of this resolution in its entirety shows that in order to meet the objections to the holding-company bill, there will be nothing left.

Self-regulation of industry: This resolution enumerates the benefits and blessings of the self-regulation of industry and says:

Little weight will attach to what I have to say about this action upon the part of a supposed nonpartisan gathering of business men, but whose speeches and resolutions sound more like a national convention of Republican politicians, but some weight should attach to the reaction on the part of newspapers none too friendly to the President's program.

The Washington Post, which so liberally reported the chamber's convention, was not so liberal in its comment on its action. Its editorial in its issue of May 4 is headed "A Bungling Attack", and the editorial is fully up to the heading. It ought to be taken to heart by these purblind leaders of big business who appear to be laboring under the delusion that the time is at hand for the resumption of its partnership with Government which was terminated on March 4, 1933, that is, if one can call the relationship of master and servant a partnership.

The newspaper, referring to the paragraph above quoted from the resolutions on social security, says:

The result is that the chamber's general endorsement of social security legislation appears to be mere lip service, if not actually insincere.

This, mind you, is not a Democratic Member of Congress speaking.

The editorial, after noting—the significant silence of the chamber of commerce on the subject of the works-relief program, its advocacy of subsidies to merchant vessels, and its plea for Federal regulation of all forms of interstate commerce, showing that the business men of the country are far from averse to benefit from certain forms of Government aid—

Caustically adds:

They cannot expect to get away with an attitude which condemns all government intervention that offers no direct, tangible benefits to business.

The editorial carries equally caustic comment on the recommendation that the National Recovery Act be permitted to expire in June, but asking for emergency substitute legislation which would "greatly increase the privileges of organized industries operating under voluntary codes", while, "at the same time it condemns collective-bargaining arrangements which would give similar preferential position to organized labor."

It is small wonder—

The newspaper adds—

that the disposition to ask for more power and at the same time expressing disapproval of all policies that entail sacrifices for business, creates a most unfavorable impression.

The editorial also comments on the London reaction to the resolutions as follows:

The hostile attitude of the delegates toward administration policies is reported to have "shocked" the head of the United States Chamber of Commerce in London. He pointed out that British business had cooperated with the Government and had willingly undertaken sacrifices to speed recovery. He predicted that if American business fails to do likewise, it would get something worse.

The reaction of the head of the United States Chamber of Commerce in England is strikingly in accord with the warning voiced by United States District Judge John C. Knox, of New York, before the Harvard Club in New York on April 24.

Judge Knox is quoted by the press agencies as having stated that capitalism would best serve the interests of the Nation and its own if it revised its own program and came out for decent social legislation.

As decent social legislation the jurist stressed bank-deposit insurance, old-age pensions, and unemployment insurance; and he is quoted as stating that unless capitalism agrees to these and other needed reforms, it would be "scattered to the wrathful winds." I quote Judge Knox further:

The public has not forgotten the events of the recent past which came about as the result of capitalism indulgence in an orgy of unrestrained license * * *. It remembers enormous bond issues that were authorized by dishonest and impecunious governments and sold to the public by the best known bankers and brokers in America.

It bears in recollection that individuals whose names are supposed to be synonymous with honored integrity used their power to rape the investors of the United States, and it doesn't hesitate to assess the blame.

And he concluded his remarkable arraignment of the system which has made a program of reform imperative with the following admonition:

If capitalism persists much longer in the belief that it is superior to the rest of humanity, and if it continues to exhibit the selfishness which has heretofore animated its being and which still stirs in its heart, the citadel of concentrated wealth is in danger of serious impairment.

Mr. Speaker, if the warning of Judge Knox had been uttered after the chamber of commerce convention, instead of before, it could not have been more applicable to the spirit and action of that assemblage. The speeches and resolutions were in defiance of the President and in defiance of the Congress. They were unquestionably based upon the belief that the tide has definitely turned and envisions a "return to normalcy" in 1936.

Mr. Speaker, I want to report to the President, from a small and distant outpost, that if there is a tide running it is not in that direction. If there is a danger to the administration it was not represented at the United States Chamber of Commerce in Washington. For what my judgment may be worth. I have never felt that the "new dealers" could sit down across the table from the "old dealers" and get a new deal out of it. I would welcome their open opposition rather than the alternative of having them pretend to string along with the administration only with the end in view of hamstringing it. There is no earthly way in which the President or the Democratic Party can get the support of the United States Chamber of Commerce and what it represents. The President and the party could only lose the support of millions of progressives, both Democrats and Republicans, in the attempt. The program should go through, every major measure on it, even if it takes all summer. Every measure considered vital to the completion of the program should be put on the books at this session of Congress and be given a measure of time to work out. It is useless to think of coming back to Washington next winter and getting our case ready for submission to the people. This should be the answer of the President and Congress to the United States Chamber of Commerce.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

AMENDMENT OF WAR MINERALS RELIEF STATUTES

The Clerk called the first bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 2077, to amend section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, generally known as the "War Minerals Relief Statutes."

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio and Mr. ZIONCHECK rose.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I may say I intend to object to this bill. This is a measure that provides for an expenditure of $1,200,000. To save time I shall enter a formal objection at this time, because I understand this bill is to be brought up under suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. This bill requires three objections.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ZIONCHECK, Mr. McLEAN, and Mr. BACON objected.

PACIFIC EXPOSITION OF 1938 AT LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

The Clerk called the next resolution, House Joint Resolution 164, authorizing the President to invite foreign countries to participate in the Pacific Exposition of 1938 at Los Angeles, Calif.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand there is some conflict between the thriving cities on the western coast. They are all crowding us for world fairs at this time. We have already voted to do our part by San Diego and, personally, I think San Diego ought to have the first chance, and I am advised that these other cities are more or less infringing upon the rights of San Diego, and perhaps, somewhat retarding its chances for making their exposition a great success, and for this reason I object.

The SPEAKER. This bill requires three objections.

Mr. McLEAN and Mr. BLANTON also objected.

TO REPATRIATE NATIVE-BORN WOMEN WHO LOST NATIONALITY BY MARRIAGE TO AN ALIEN

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 4354, to repatriate native-born women who have heretofore lost their citizenship by marriage to an alien, and for other purposes.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF UNITED STATES MARSHALS

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar H. R. 5456, relating to the powers and duties of United States marshals.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 787 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 503), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 787. It shall be the duty of the marshal of each district to attend the district courts when sitting therein and to execute all lawful precepts issued under the authority of the United States; and he shall have power to command all necessary assistance in the execution of his duty."

SEC. 2. That, in addition to all other powers, United States marshals and their deputies shall have the power to make arrests without warrant for any offense against the laws of the United States committed in their presence or for any felony cognizable under the laws of the United States in cases where there is reasonable ground to believe that such felony has been or is being committed and that the person to be arrested has committed or is committing it. The marshals and their deputies shall also have the power to carry firearms.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 6, strike out the words "there is reasonable ground to believe that", and in line 7, after the word "has", insert the words "in fact"; line 8, before the word "that", insert the words "they have reasonable grounds to believe."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TO ASSIST LATIN AMERICAN REPUBLICS IN MILITARY AND NAVAL MATTERS

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 3482, to amend the act of May 19, 1926, an act to authorize the President to detail officers and enlisted men of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to assist the governments of the Latin American Republics in military and naval matters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Reserving the right to object, do I understand that under this bill the United States will assign enlisted men and officers to assist South American Republics in military preparations?

Mr. GUEVARA. No; the purpose of the bill is to amend the law of May 19, 1926, by including therein the Philippine Islands.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I have no objection.

Mr. McLEAN. Perhaps I can enlighten the gentleman. It has been the practice in the past for the United States to assign officers and enlisted men to the South American Republics to assist those republics in making their plans for national defense. All the expense is borne by those countries. This matter came before the Committee on Military Affairs on a proposal to amend the law so that the officers and enlisted men of the Army and the Navy of the United States could assist people of the Philippine Islands, in anticipation of their independence, to plan for their national defense. It was thought that it would be a friendly act on the part of the United States toward the Philippine Islands to enable them to have the same advantages in their study of this problem which we have given South American Republics.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection, because it adds to Santo Domingo the Philippine Islands. I think the original bill was wrong.

Mr. SNELL. Let me ask the gentleman: We have officers and enlisted men in the Philippine Islands now?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; it will not involve any expense to the Government.

Mr. RANKIN. You do not intend to send the fleet there, that is to have the maneuvers in the Pacific?

Mr. McLEAN. No; I think that has more relation to San Diego and the success of the exposition this summer.

There being no objection, the Senate bill was substituted for the House bill.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of May 19, 1926 (Public, No. 247), be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the word "and" preceding the words "Santo Domingo" and inserting after the words "Santo Domingo" the words "and the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PAWNEE TRIBE OF INDIANS OF OKLAHOMA

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4376) for the relief of the Pawnee Tribe of Indians of Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? This bill requires three objections.

Mr. BACON, Mr. JENKINS of Ohio, and Mr. TRUAX objected.

SAN FRANCISCO EXPOSITION OF 1938

The Clerk called House Joint Resolution 151, authorizing and requesting the President to invite the countries of the world to participate in the San Francisco Exposition of 1938 at San Francisco, Calif.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. This bill is almost identical with the bill objected to sometime ago concerning a world's fair at Los Angeles. I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill requires three objectors.

Mr. McLEAN and Mr. BACON objected.

TO REPATRIATE NATIVE-BORN PERSONS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 3023) to provide for citizenship to persons born in the United States who have not acquired any other nationality by personal affirmative act, but who heretofore lost their United States citizenship through the naturalization of a parent under the laws of a foreign country, and for other purposes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF NEHALEM, MIAMI, AND OTHER RIVERS, OREG.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4077) authorizing a preliminary examination of the Nehalem, Miami, Kilchis, Willson, Trask, and Tillamook Rivers in Tillamook County, Oreg., with a view to the controlling of floods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. There are five or six bills following in succession to this one, all of the same import. They are not identically the same, but they are all flood bills. My inquiry is to know whether, if we decide to pass the first one, we can pass all the rest of them without going through the formality of reading them all?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question, but the Chair thinks action better be taken with reference to each individual bill.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, there are six or eight bills all in the same section of the United States. I shall not take the responsibility of objecting to the bill, but here is what these bills do. About a week or 10 days ago we passed a river and harbor bill. In that bill were many amendments which provided for the same thing exactly as this bill provides. In other words, for surveys by Army engineers of flood and river projects. We have had the matter up here repeatedly. We on this side used to object to these bills upon the ground that it is an invasion of the prerogatives of one committee by another. In other words, if the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has authority over these bills, the Flood Relief Committee ought not to have authority; but I am speaking more or less for the minority. We do not have the responsibility for legislation and I shall not object. I call attention of the leaders on the other side, however, to the fact that we are embarking on a policy that is unnecessary, if not dangerous. Here we are providing for surveys of a lot of projects, while the same officials who come in and say they have no objection to this—and I refer to the Army engineers. They say that they have no objection when the river and harbor projects are under consideration. I am not unfriendly to either of these plans, but there should be something done to fix the jurisdiction of these committees, so that their jurisdictions would not conflict. I shall say no more, but leave the responsibility where it belongs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman withhold his request until I can make a very brief explanation?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I concur in the position taken by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS]. In view of the fact that we have already passed the rivers and harbors bill, and in view of the fact that we have appropriated millions of dollars in the $4,800,000,000 Federal works bill, to be on this same kind of project, I think it unwise and unfair to single out any particular State and pass these bills at this time. I hope the gentleman from Oregon will agree to let them all be passed over without prejudice so that we may have further opportunity to enlighten ourselves on what the administration proposes to do in this regard.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I asked the gentleman to withhold his request until I can make a very brief statement. Then if he insists upon it, the bills may go over until the next Consent Calendar day. These are not river and harbor bills, as the gentleman seems to think. These are bills over which the Flood Control Committee has exclusive jurisdiction. The bills simply give authority for the making of a preliminary examination, not a flood-control survey, but a preliminary examination to determine whether or not a flood-control survey should be made.

They are made by the district engineers who are permanently stationed in Oregon, where these rivers are.

Mr. TRUAX. I think that is the very question that should be decided by the Department of the Interior and other departments that are now considering those projects for the entire country. There are other States which have the same right and the same claim upon these preliminary surveys as the gentleman's State.

Mr. MOTT. That is correct. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, there is no reason why any Member from any State should not introduce such a bill. If this were a bill for a preliminary survey of a river and harbor project, the gentleman understands it would not have to come into Congress at all. A resolution from the committee is sufficient; but that is not the case with a preliminary examination of a river with a view to determining whether or not a flood-control survey should be made. That must be done by introducing a bill for that purpose. The bill must be sent to the committee, the committee must report it out, and the House must pass it.

A bill of this kind does not necessitate the expenditure of additional money. The resident engineers, not only in Oregon but in every State, already have nearly all of the data in regard to the report that we are asking them to make, but they cannot make the report unless by a bill of this kind they are authorized to do so. They go through the district continuously. They have accumulated data on the flood conditions of each one of these rivers. All this bill really provides is the authority to officially compile those data and report it, so that it will be officially available when P. W. A. is ready to consider flood-control projects.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. Regular order is demanded. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX]?

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TRUAX. I object to the consideration of the bill.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF THE UMPQUA RIVER, OREG.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5651, authorizing a preliminary examination of the Umpqua River, Ore.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF COQUILLE RIVER, OREG.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5773, to authorize a preliminary examination of Coquille River and its tributaries in the State of Oregon with a view to the control of its floods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF ROGUE RIVER, OREG.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5774, to authorize a preliminary examination of Rogue River and its tributaries in the State of Oregon with a view to the control of its floods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF SIUSLAW RIVER, OREG.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5775, to authorize a preliminary examination of Siuslaw River and its tributaries in the State of Oregon with a view to the control of its floods.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF YAQUINA RIVER, OREG.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5776, to authorize a preliminary examination of Yaquina River and its tributaries in the State of Oregon with a view to the control of its floods.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, since the first two of this group of bills were objected to, I have not objected to the following bills in this group going over until the next time without prejudice. I desire at this time to withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio with reference to Calendar Nos. 49 and 50, and I now ask unanimous consent that they may go over without prejudice until the next Consent Calendar day.

Mr. TRUAX. That will be agreeable to me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] that this bill be passed over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT] asks unanimous consent that Calendar No. 49, H. R. 4077, and Calendar No. 50, H. R. 5651, be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOTT. Calendar Nos. 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, and 55 have all been passed over without prejudice?

The SPEAKER. Calendar No. 55 has not yet been reached.

The Clerk will call the next bill.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION OF SILETZ RIVER, OREG.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5777, to authorize a preliminary examination of Siletz River and its tributaries in the State of Oregon with a view to the control of its floods.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

APPROPRIATION FOR BOOKS FOR ADULT BLIND

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6371, to authorize an increase in the annual appropriation for books for the adult blind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I make this reservation to say that we on the Republican side feel this is a very fine bill, and I am in favor of it. I favor any reasonable effort to do something for the most unfortunate group of our people—the poor blind.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Reserving the right to object, I heartily agree with what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] says, but I notice that this bill comes from the Committee on the Library and it appropriates $175,000. For the purpose of protecting the Committee on Appropriations in respect to appropriations, I wish the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] would explain why an appropriation is made and not authorized, as is customary in these bills.

Mr. KELLER. The fact is, it is an authorization rather than an appropriation. That was the intention of the bill. The bill is an authorization and not an appropriation. The reason for the increase is simply this: This Congress has for a number of years prior appropriated under regular law $100,000 a year for the printing of what is called the "Braille" system of raised letters for the blind of the country. During the past year there has been developed a very excellent system of sound-producing records so that blind people may hear books read. The fact is that about one-fourth of the blind people of the United States can use the Braille system. The other three-quarters, becoming blind later in life, did not learn to use the Braille system. Therefore it has been the effort on the part of those interested in that matter to develop some system by which those who have not developed the sensibility at the end of their fingers could get some way of reading books. That has been worked out finally. For the purpose of trying that out and giving effect to three-quarters of the blind of this country, this authorization of $75,000 is asked for.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am heartily in accord with the bill. I think it is a splendid movement and that the fund should be increased. If the gentleman is certain this bill merely authorizes the expenditure instead of appropriating the money, then, of course, I shall have no objection to the bill.

Mr. KELLER. It makes the authorization only.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. Personally, I feel that this is a worthy project, but I would like to ask the gentleman if the American School Book Trust has anything to do with it?

Mr. KELLER. No; of course not.

Mr. TRUAX. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

Mr. KELLER. I may say further that the machines for using these records are not to cost the Government a penny. They are provided for the blind people of the country by liberal-minded people who are interested in them. There is no cost to the Government outside of the cost of making the records.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. And, if the gentleman will yield, these records are made by a nonprofit corporation, are they not?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I wish to confirm the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois. It is absolutely correct. About 30 percent only of the blind people are able to read by the Braille system; 70 percent are unable to because most of them lost their sight after age 45. I want the gentleman to know I appreciate his interest in this bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. I wish to supplement what the Chairman of the Committee on the Library has said. This committee has gone into the merits of this increased appropriation with a great deal of care. The bill has the active support and cooperation of those in the Library in charge of the interests of the blind. I think we should be governed largely by their suggestions and recommendations. I heartily agree with the chairman of the committee as to the merits of the bill.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. One reason I feel so strongly for this bill is that a few days ago I had the opportunity of observing a demonstration of the wonderful improvements in sound machinery for the benefit of the blind. Furthermore, this is directly in line with the fight I made at the time the social-security bill was under consideration, to provide more relief for the poor blind people.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1, as amended, of the act entitled "An act to provide books for the adult blind", approved March 3, 1931 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 2, sec. 135a), is amended (1) by striking out "$100,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$175,000", and (2) by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That of said annual appropriation of $175,000, not exceeding $100,000 thereof shall be expended for books in raised characters, and not exceeding $75,000 thereof shall be expended for sound-reproduction records."

Sec. 2. This act shall be applicable with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for each fiscal year thereafter.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NOME, ALASKA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5707, to ratify and confirm the corporate existence of the city of Nome, Alaska, and to authorize it to undertake certain municipal public works, including the construction, reconstruction, enlargement, extension, and improvement of its sewers and drains, fire-fighting system, streets and alleys, sidewalks, curbs and gutters, and a municipal building, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $100,000.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the corporate existence and present boundaries of the city of Nome, Alaska, a municipal corporation of the Territory of Alaska, second judicial division, are hereby recognized, ratified, and confirmed; and the same shall not be open to question in any court of law on the ground of destruction of records or otherwise.

Sec. 2. That the incorporated city of Nome, Territory of Alaska, is hereby authorized and empowered to undertake the municipal public works hereinafter specified or any one or more thereof, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any amount not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $100,000. Said city of Nome, Alaska, is hereby authorized and empowered (a) to construct, reconstruct, enlarge, extend, and improve its sewers and drains, and for such purpose to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $15,000; (b) to construct, reconstruct, enlarge, extend, and improve its fire-fighting system, and for such purpose to issue bonds not exceeding $35,000; (c) to construct, reconstruct, enlarge, extend, and improve its streets and alleys, and for such purpose to issue bonds not exceeding $12,000; (d) to construct, reconstruct, enlarge, extend, and improve its sidewalks, curbs, and gutters, and for such purpose to issue bonds not exceeding $20,770; (e) to construct a municipal building, and for such purpose to issue bonds not exceeding $17,230.

Sec. 3. Before said bonds shall be issued a special election shall be ordered by the common council of the said city of Nome, Alaska, at which election the question of whether such bonds shall be issued in the amount specified for any or all of the purposes hereinbefore set forth shall be submitted to the qualified electors of said city of Nome, Territory of Alaska, whose names appear on the last assessment roll of said city for purposes of municipal taxation. The form of the ballot shall be such that the electors may vote for or against the issuance of bonds for each of the purposes herein specified in the amounts herein authorized. Not less than 20 days' notice of such election shall be given to the public by posting notices of the same in three conspicuous places within the corporate limits of the city of Nome, Territory of Alaska, one of which shall be at the front door of the United States post office at Nome, Alaska. The election notice shall specifically state the amount of bonds proposed to be issued for each of the purposes herein specified. The registration for such election, the manner of conducting the same, and the canvass of the returns of said election shall be, as nearly as practicable, in accordance with the requirements of law in general for special elections in said municipality; and said bonds shall be issued for any or all of the purposes herein authorized only upon condition that not less than a majority of the votes cast at such election in said municipality shall be in favor of the issuance of said bonds for such purpose or purposes.

Sec. 4. The bonds herein authorized to be issued shall be coupon in form and shall mature in not to exceed 30 years from the date thereof. Such bonds may bear such date or dates, may be in such denomination or denominations, may mature in such amounts and at such time or times, not exceeding 30 years from the date thereof, may be payable in such medium of payment and at such place or places, may be sold at either public or private sale, may be nonredeemable or redeemable (either with or without premium), may carry such registration privileges as to either principal and interest, principal only, or both, as shall be prescribed by the common council of said city of Nome. The bonds shall bear the signature of the mayor and of the clerk of the city of Nome, and shall have impressed thereon the official seal of said municipality. The coupons to be annexed to such bonds shall bear the facsimile signatures of the mayor and of the clerk of said municipality. In case any of the officers whose signatures or countersignatures appear on the bonds shall cease to be such officers before delivery of such bonds, such signatures or countersignatures, whether manual or facsimile, shall nevertheless be valid and sufficient for all purposes, the same as if said officers had remained in office until such delivery. Said bonds shall bear interest at a rate to be fixed by the common council of the city of Nome, not to exceed, however, 6 percent per annum, payable semiannually, and said bonds shall be sold at not less than the principal amount thereof plus accrued interest.

Sec. 5. The bonds herein authorized to be issued shall be general obligations of the city of Nome, Territory of Alaska, payable as to both interest and principal from ad valorem taxes which shall be levied upon all of the taxable property within the corporate limits of such municipality in an amount sufficient to pay the interest on and the principal of such bonds as and when the same become due and payable.

SEC. 6. No part of the funds arising from the sale of said bonds shall be used for any purpose or purposes other than those specified in this act. Said bonds shall be sold only when and in such amounts as the common council of the city of Nome shall direct; and the proceeds thereof shall be distributed only for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned and under the orders and directions of said common council from time to time as such proceeds may be required for said purposes.

SEC. 7. The city of Nome is hereby authorized to enter into contracts with the United States of America or any agency or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act and acts amendatory thereof and acts supplemental thereto, and revisions thereof, and the regulations made in pursuance thereof, and under any further acts of the Congress of the United States to encourage public works, for the sale of bonds issued in accordance with the provisions of this act or for the acceptance of a grant of money to aid said municipality in financing any public works herein authorized; or to enter into contracts with any persons or corporations, public or private, for the sale of such bonds; and such contracts may contain such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by and between the common council of said city of Nome and the United States of America or any agency or instrumentality thereof or any such purchaser.

SEC. 8. This act shall take effect immediately.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

H. R. 3482

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the bill (H. R. 3482) just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration is founded upon the principle that national security is the first and most important responsibility of a self-governing commonwealth. This is also true as to a sovereign and independent government.

This axiom which constitutes the whole philosophy of a national life is clearly understood by the leaders of the Filipino people, who are already turning their attention toward the solution of the many problems that will arise in the Philippine Islands coincidentally with the inauguration of its commonwealth. They realize fully that when that moment arrives there must be in effective operation a system of defense faithfully adjusted to the requirements of the Philippine Islands and capable of sustaining the integrity of the new commonwealth. Development of such a system will constitute one of the most difficult tasks to be undertaken by the future Philippine government upon its inauguration during the late summer of the current year. The Congress of the United States, in passing Public Act 127, Seventy-third Congress, commonly known as the "Tydings-McDuffie law", had for its aim and purpose the enfranchisement of the people of the Philippine Islands with the right to govern themselves and to assume certain obligations and responsibilities inherent to a self-governing country and compatible with the sovereignty of the United States. One of these obligations and responsibilities that arises from the right of self-government is to provide means for stability and security in cooperation with the United States as a sovereign power.

The Filipino people are prepared and willing to take the share that in this respect belongs to them. Even though that complete responsibility for determining the form, the size, the function, and the composition of the defensive force that is permanently to endure must rest upon the Filipino people, nevertheless, the cooperation and advice of the United States is essential. The devising and setting up of the requisite machinery for the purpose of obtaining an effective defense of the commonwealth of the Philippine Islands should be the result of a common accord between the United States and the Philippine Islands. Upon the accuracy of these decisions and the promptness and effectiveness with which they must be executed may depend the future welfare of the Filipino people.

Passage of the bill now under consideration will assure the commonwealth government of the Philippines of a vitally necessary type of assistance in approaching this difficult and important problem. The kind of assistance to which I refer comprises technical knowledge and professional skill, the need for which will be urgent.

It is no reflection upon the capacity of my people if I say at the outset that we have had no experience in dealing with fundamental questions pertaining to national security. The responsibility for defense and major policies connected with our national security have at all times devolved upon the country to which we owe allegiance.

We have produced good soldiers and we are proud of them. However, we have produced no General Staff. We number among our people many splendid combat officers, but not a sufficient number of profound students of the military art. But if the Congress of the United States will authorize us to utilize the services of qualified experts from the Army of this Nation until the time arrives when we can develop among our own people an efficient General Staff which can proceed promptly and confidently to the solution of problems whose urgency permits of no delay, I am certain that the stability and security of the Commonwealth of the Philippines will be assured.

Adoption of the bill now under consideration will not only authorize the professional assistance we seek but will give assurance that it will be rendered in such fashion as to accord full recognition to our own inescapable responsibility. It should be our common aim and purpose to establish in the Philippines a self-sufficient and self-reliant defense. If this is not done it will be fatal.

While it may be presumed that this kind of assistance could be rendered by the United States under informal agreement between the Philippines and the American defense department, such an arrangement would not be as satisfactory as would one bearing the positive sanction of Congress. Without this sanction there would be no assurance as to the continuity and permanency of the arrangement. This consideration is extremely important to the Philippines, as the new government will naturally want to be assured that the professional assistance rendered will be available as long as it may prove necessary, and that it will be available from the same source.

In view of the political relationship existing between the United States and the Philippine Islands, our people would, without question, prefer that the source of help be from this great Nation. We have an undying faith in the friendly intentions of the United States toward our people and in her altruistic attitude toward our domestic problems. It would be a great disappointment to us were we compelled to look to some other nation for the assistance and encouragement which the Filipino people are sure the American Congress will be glad to grant, for it understands the urgency of our need and the importance of our problem.

I would be recreant to my duty if I did not say to the world that the military establishment of the Philippines will, both by the determined desire of the Filipino people and by the requirements of their situation, be purely and passively defensive. Entirely aside from our pacific and nonaggressive intentions, important considerations of geography, finances, and comparative size preclude any possibility of building up any military machine that could be utilized for aggressive purposes. I can assure this House that the sole purpose of the future government of the Philippine Commonwealth will be to organize a defensive system that can assure domestic tranquillity and safety from attack.

An efficient defense, established and maintained with this single objective, cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be considered as a menace to the peace or security of any other nation. To the contrary, it will be a stabilizing influence in that part of the world and will promote the free flow of commerce and protect the concept of liberty and justice upon which our government will be founded. It will stand as a bulwark between my people and any attempted interference with their inalienable rights. These objectives and these ideals have been duly represented to the executive departments of the Government of the United States.

Permit me to say in closing that the element of time is important. The process of establishing the broad lines of our defensive system should be undertaken immediately upon the inauguration of the government of the Philippine Commonwealth, which, it is anticipated, will take place within a few months. This explains our anxiety that the authorization sought in the bill now under consideration be accorded promptly, so that no moment may be wasted in approaching a task which will require our devoted efforts throughout every minute of the time available. Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to assure the American people that the adoption of the bill now under consideration will be gratefully appreciated by the Filipinos. It will be regarded as additional and significant evidence of the sympathetic, cooperative attitude and friendly understanding that has habitually characterized the American Government in all its dealings with the Philippine Islands.

DISPOSAL OF CERTAIN SURPLUS PERSONAL PROPERTY

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 60, to authorize the disposal of surplus personal property, including buildings, of the Emergency Conservation Work.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the author of the bill, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER], the purpose of the bill.

Mr. TARVER. In the Emergency Conservation Work there is oftentimes a situation under which a great deal of property which might be useful for some purpose, but which is of no use to the Government, must be junked and sold for practically nothing, since the Government authorities having it in charge do not have authority to transfer it to others who could make good public use of it. For example, there are many C. C. C. camps which, having served their purpose, are being abandoned. They are equipped with temporary wooden buildings which would be worth nothing if junked, but which could well be used as camps for 4-H clubs, Boy Scout camps, camps for tubercular patients, camps for undernourished children, and they could be put to other similar uses.

The bill proposes to authorize the authorities of the Government—that is, the Director of Procurement of the Treasury Department—under the recommendation of the department of the Government having jurisdiction over the camp which is abandoned, to transfer such surplus property for which the Government has no use to State, county, or municipal authorities for use by 4-H clubs, or for public health, recreational, educational, or similar uses.

Mr. NICHOLS. The bill does not provide, then, for the sale of these wooden buildings for some small cash consideration to private individuals?

Mr. TARVER. Oh, no. It authorizes the donation to local authorities of these buildings and of other property of this character where it may be used locally, and where the Federal Government has no use for it.

Mr. NICHOLS. The bill states "surplus personal property." Will the gentleman tell me what agent determines whether it is surplus or not; is it Admiral Peoples?

Mr. TARVER. The Director of the Emergency Conservation Works. However, the companion Senate bill, S. 82, has been amended to require the recommendation of the head of the department which has under its jurisdiction the C. C. C. camp which has been abandoned.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman is sure that there is nothing in the bill which will cripple the program of establishing C. C. C. camps and E. C. W. camps over the United States? That is the thing I am interested in primarily.

Mr. TARVER. Absolutely not. The bill has been favorably recommended by every department of the Government which has anything to do with its provisions.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I feel I shall have to object, because this Congress has made a signal reputation in the matter of the use of language.

There has grown up in the legal profession the abortive phrase "and/or" which no one understands. So far as further legislation of the Congress is concerned, those of us who believe in preserving the dignity and importance of our jurisprudence and the proper use of language in legal parlance ought not to permit the use of the abortive phrase "and/or" to further enter into legislation which is to be passed by this Congress. There are other reasons which constrain me to object; therefore, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman reserve his objection? Does the gentleman's objection relate only to the words "and/or"?

Mr. McLEAN. No; I have grave fears as to the principal. Mr. TURNER demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE FOR THE NINTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5917, to appoint an additional circuit judge for the ninth judicial district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in reference to this bill providing for the appointment of an additional judge, I wonder if the gentleman would agree to pass it over without prejudice?

Mr. LLOYD. I would rather not. This is a bill about which I spoke to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] and his colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], when it was reached the other day, and I thought we had an agreement that the bill was meritorious.

Mr. TRUAX. I intended to make the same request in reference to another bill that is farther down the calendar.

Mr. LLOYD. There really exists an emergency, may I say to the gentleman.

Mr. TRUAX. What is the emergency?

Mr. LLOYD. The emergency is that the court is away behind with its docket. The gentleman will notice the letter from the Attorney General, in which he has gone further, I believe, than I have ever known him to go in connection with the recommendation of this important legislation.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I may say to my colleague the gentleman from Ohio that I am opposed to inferior Federal judges as a class. I think as a class the inferior Federal judiciary of our country has been arbitrary and tyrannical, but in this instance I have investigated the matter personally and in comparison with the other districts in the country I feel there is a real need for the additional circuit judge called for in this bill. Some of these other bills calling for additional district and circuit judges I feel are not meritorious, but, personally, I feel this is a meritorious bill.

Mr. TRUAX. I have great respect for the judgment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Young], but I would like to ask him if he feels our mutual constituents back home, the farmers, the small business men, and the laboring men favor an appropriation for the appointment of additional judges? I have heard the gentleman say that if the present judges devoted more time to their duties and did not take so many vacations there would be no need for additional judges.

Mr. YOUNG. I may say to the gentleman that I personally look forward with hope to the day when all of the inferior Federal judges and the inferior Federal judiciary of our country is done away with and we have only the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. TRUAX. Is this not a good time to start now with that policy?

Mr. YOUNG. I think it would be time to start soon.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman reserve his request at this time?

Mr. TRUAX. I withhold my request.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Does the gentleman realize that in the ninth circuit they have cases coming to them from China, Hawaii, and Alaska, not alone the other States which they take in, and that they have a more crowded calendar than any other circuit in the United States?

Mr. TRUAX. I may say to the gentleman that would be one case which has come to my attention where they might really be earning their money. I cannot say that is true as to the group, however.

Mr. LLOYD. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

OBSERVANCE AND CELEBRATION OF THE ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ORDINANCE OF 1787 AND THE SETTLEMENT OF THE NORTHWEST TERRITORY

The Clerk called the next resolution, House Joint Resolution 208, to provide for the observance and celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the adoption of the Ordinance of 1787 and the settlement of the Northwest Territory.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask my colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECREST] if this bill is not known to some of us as the bill for the relief of George White, ex-Governor of Ohio?

Mr. SECREST. I may say to the gentleman that ex-Governor White has no official connection with this matter.

Mr. TRUAX. He will have if the bill becomes law.

Mr. SECREST. If he does, it can only be by appointment by the President of the United States; and, of course, I am not in position to speak for the President. I may say that this celebration is planned in connection with the six States formed from the old Northwest Territory.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, this resolution authorizes an appropriation of $100,000 for the celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the purchase of the Northwest Territory. The first settlement in that territory was at Marietta, Ohio. I am informed that this bill has been called by some "a bill for the relief of George White, ex-Governor of Ohio", a citizen of Marietta. I have a tentative budget submitted by the gentleman who, I understand, is to be the director-manager, in which he estimates some of the expenditures for which this $100,000 is being appropriated.

Mr. KELLER. Who is that?

Mr. TRUAX. His name is Hawes.

Mr. SECREST. May I say to the gentleman that Mr. Hawes has no official connection with this celebration, except through the commission.

Mr. TRUAX. I understand that matter.

Mr. SECREST. This is merely a budget which is set up in his opinion. It is simply one man's idea.

Mr. TRUAX. But, as I understand it, Mr. Hawes is to be made the manager-director, and this is to be a 3-year job.

Mr. SECREST. There is no such understanding with him on anybody's part.

Mr. TRUAX. The tentative budget submitted to me under date of April 25, 1935, says, "This is a 3-year job." Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, they propose to spend from $30,000 to $40,000 of the $100,000 in the preparation of maps of the Northwest Territory. They are going to send out about three or four million copies of this map, at a probable cost of $30,000 to $40,000.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TRUAX. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Where did the gentleman get all that stuff?

Mr. TRUAX. I get this from the budget submitted by the gentleman who expects to run the show.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice, so that the matter may be settled on the outside; otherwise I am going to object at this time.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I appreciate the work the gentleman from Washington is doing over there, and I appreciate the fact that two Ohio gentlemen are in a little wrangle, but they are going to agree.

Mr. TRUAX. No; we are not agreeing.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] insists on objecting, I withdraw my reservation.

Mr. TARVER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK] that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKRUPTCY ACT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5797, to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory and supplementary thereto.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (b), as amended and supplemented, of section 4 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, is amended by inserting after the word "wage earner" a comma and the following: "a raiser of livestock".

Sec. 2. That subsection (r) of section 75 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended and supplemented, is amended by inserting after the words "the term 'farmer' means" the words "any raiser of livestock or."

Mr. GASSAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill (S. 1616) be substituted for the House bill (H. R. 5797) and that the Senate bill be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and substituting therefor the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the Senate bill (S. 1616) be substituted for the House bill. Is there objection?

Mr. HEALEY and Mr. WOLCOTT reserved the right to object.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman state whether this takes in the poultry farmers?

Mr. GASSAWAY. Yes. This takes in every person who is engaged in any occupation that uses any material that is raised by a farmer.

Mr. HEALEY. That is all I want to know.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Oklahoma if the Senate bill is identical with the House bill.

Mr. GASSAWAY. I do not think so, because the Senate bill specifically sets up the word "farmer", and this bill will take care of every person who is engaged in the raising of livestock or poultry or engaged in dairying or any other branch of labor, the profits from which are derived from the products of the soil.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I still do not understand the gentleman's distinction. The bankruptcy law at the present time exempts the farmers from the operation of the bankruptcy law in that a farmer cannot be declared an involuntary bankrupt.

Mr. GASSAWAY. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand the purpose of this act is to clarify a doubt which has been raised in the minds of some of the courts as to whether a stock raiser or a cattle raiser is a farmer. I had no objection to the House bill, because I felt that was about all that it did. Wherein does the Senate bill differ from the House bill?

Mr. GASSAWAY. The only difference will be that it will save us about 2 weeks' time by amending the Senate bill and sending it back to the Senate.

Mr. WOLCOTT. What difference is there in the substitution of the Senate bill for the House bill?

Mr. DEMPSEY. If the gentleman from Oklahoma will permit, the Senate bill provides for stock raisers and the House went further than that and included poultry raisers and dairymen.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is not the House bill a better bill than the Senate bill?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes; and the gentleman from Oklahoma is asking unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill, striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting the House bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It seems to me that destroys that feature of the House bill by which poultry raisers, and so forth, are brought in.

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; that will bring them in.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. Does the Senate bill provide for the dairymen and the poultry raisers?

Mr. DEMPSEY. We are proposing to amend the Senate bill by doing that now.

Mr. HEALEY. You are amending the Senate bill to do that?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. Is the gentleman sure about that?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. As I understand the unanimous-consent request, it is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the House bill and substitute the Senate bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman stated his purpose to be to strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and substitute the House bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, is not the parliamentary situation such that we would have to call up the Senate bill to do that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is asking that that be done, and as the Chair understands it, if the gentleman's unanimous-consent request is granted, the gentleman proposes to offer an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and substituting therefor the House bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That clarifies the situation and I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the substitution asked by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GASSAWAY]?

Mr. HEALEY. Reserving the right to object, I see nothing in the Senate bill that provides for the dairymen or the poultrymen.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman from Oklahoma is going to move to strike out all after the enacting clause in the Senate bill and substitute the House bill.

Mr. HEALEY. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill (S. 1616), as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (b), as amended and supplemented, of section 4 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, is amended by inserting after the word "wage-earner" a comma and the following: "a raiser of livestock."

Sec. 2. That subsection (r) of section 75 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended and supplemented, is amended by inserting after the words "the term 'farmer' means any raiser of livestock or."

Mr. GASSAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the provisions of H. R. 5797 as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That subsection (b), as amended and supplemented, of section 4 of the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', approved July 1, 1898, is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Any natural person, except a wage earner or a farmer, any unincorporated company, and any moneyed business, or commercial corporation (except a municipal, railroad, insurance, or banking corporation, or a building and loan association) owing debts to the amount of $1,000 or over, may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon default or an impartial trial, and shall be subject to the provisions and entitled to the benefits of this act.

"The bankruptcy of a corporation or association shall not release its officers, directors, or stockholders, as such, from any liability under the laws of a State of Territory or of the United States."

Sec. 2. That subsection (l) of section 74 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended and supplemented, is amended to read as follows:

"(l) If (1) the debtor shall fail to comply with any of the terms required of him for the protection of and indemnity against loss by the estate; or (2) the debtor has failed to make the required deposit in case of a composition; or (3) the debtor's proposal has not been accepted by the creditors; or (4) confirmation has been denied; or (5) without sufficient reason the debtor defaults in any payment required to be made under the terms of an extension proposal when the court has retained jurisdiction of the debtor or his property, the court may appoint the trustee nominated by the creditors at the first meeting, and if the creditors shall have failed to so nominate, may appoint any other qualified person as trustee to liquidate the estate. The court shall in addition adjudge the debtor a bankrupt if satisfied that he commenced or prolonged the proceeding for the purpose of delaying creditors and avoiding an adjudication in bankruptcy, or if the confirmation of his proposal has been denied. No order of liquidation or adjudication shall be entered in any proceeding under this section instituted by or against a wage earner or a farmer unless the wage earner or farmer consents."

Sec. 3. That subsection (r) of section 75 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended and supplemented, is amended to read as follows:

"(r) For the purposes of this section, section 4 (b), and section 74, the term "farmer" includes not only an individual who is primarily bona fide personally engaged in producing products of the soil but also any individual who is primarily bona fide personally engaged in dairy farming, the production of poultry or livestock, or the production of poultry products or livestock products in their unmanufactured state, or the principal part of whose income is derived from any one or more of the foregoing operations, and includes the personal representative of a deceased farmer; and a farmer shall be deemed a resident of any county in which such operations occur."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The bill H. R. 5797 was laid on the table.

APPEALS IN CRIMINAL CASES FROM THE DISTRICT COURT OF ALASKA

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 6114, to amend section 128 of the Judicial Code, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the chairman of the committee why there is an apparent inconsistency between the amount that is involved in a case of an appeal from the District Court of Alaska to the ninth judicial district and the amount in the original act for appeal in the other district courts? Is there a special act creating the District Court of Alaska requiring a different amount for an appeal from other district courts?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Alaska to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. DIMOND. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Michigan, let me say that when the Judicial Code was passed Alaska and the Virgin Islands were put in a separate category so far as the bill is concerned. Appeals from any other district court of the United States could be had in a criminal case, whereas in Alaska you could only take an appeal in a criminal case if the amount of the fine involved a thousand dollars or imprisonment in jail for more than a year. The object of the amendment is to put Alaska in the same class as other district courts. This has been approved by the Attorney General and is in the interest of uniformity.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It does not change in any respect the Code as to other district courts or the amount involved?

Mr. DIMOND. Not at all; it does not change the law with reference to district courts in the United States. It only puts the District Court of Alaska in harmony with the others.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Is it not possible that there will be extra expense for the litigants to come to the United States?

Mr. DIMOND. No; there will be no objection, because it applies mostly to criminal cases. There is no objection to it from any source.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The litigants will have to pay the expense.

Mr. DIMOND. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. In the Territory of Alaska there is no court of appeals. This is the best thing that can be done under the situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph "Third" of subsection (a) of section 128 of the Judicial Code, as amended (43 Stat. 936 U. S. C. title 28, sec. 225 (a)), be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Third. In the district courts for Alaska or any division thereof, and for the Virgin Islands, in all civil cases, wherein the Constitution or a statute or treaty of the United States or any authority exercised thereunder is involved; in all other civil cases wherein the value in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, exceeds $1,000; in all criminal cases and in all habeas corpus proceedings; and in the District Court for the Canal Zone in the cases and mode prescribed in the act approved September 21, 1922, amending prior laws relating to the Canal Zone."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN LANDS IN HOPKINS COUNTY, KY.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 3012) to authorize the transfer of certain lands in Hopkins County, Ky., to the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I notice that the report does not state anywhere why the Government is giving up these 5,000 acres.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, the Government is not giving up 5,000. It is giving up only 447½ acres. Immediately after the World War a veterans' hospital was established out of some territory carved out of the two counties, Hopkins and Christian, in Kentucky. The citizens of that locality donated to the Government 5,000 acres. There are 447½ acres of land that the Veterans' Bureau cannot use. It is cut off by a stream. It is now desired to donate that land to the State of Kentucky to make a park.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The report does not show where the land came from. With that explanation, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized and directed to convey to the Commonwealth of Kentucky, for State park purposes, without expense to the United States, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to certain lands in Hopkins County, Ky., described as follows:

Beginning at an iron-pipe corner marked "H. L. & I. Co.-G. W. Beshear-Alexander Estate-C. T. Kirkwood-No. '1'", in a fence line, on the southerly side of a road, about 30 feet southerly from a culvert at a right-angle turn in a road, willow pointer;

Thence north 73°33'30" west 1,979.86 feet to a square stone marked "No. '2'", on a flat, at a large leaning sweetgum, sweetgum and poplar pointers;

Thence north 73°32'40" west 1,365.12 feet to a square-stone corner marked "No. '3'", on a flat at a fence corner, large spanish-oak and hackberry pointers; said corner no. 3 being also a corner to the property of L. B. Lamson;

Thence north 17°32'50" east 987.19 feet to an iron-pipe corner marked "H. L. & I. Co.-L. B. Lamson-No. '4'", on a southerly slope, near the northwesterly edge of a flat, about 200 feet southerly from a road, large beech and forked beech pointers; Thence north 58°6'30" east 841.08 feet to a square-stone corner marked "No. '5'", on top of a sandstone cliff, sweetgum and white-oak pointers, both small;

Thence north 3°25'30" east 334.62 feet to a square-stone corner marked "No. '6'", on a steep southerly hillside, below a sandstone cliff, two hickory, black-oak, white-oak, and sugar-tree pointers;

Thence north 75°7'40" west 716.12 feet to a square-stone corner marked "No. '7'", on a southerly slope, about 50 feet northerly from a sandstone canyon, two hickory, black-oak, and black-walnut pointers;

Thence south 73°19'50" west 1,608.30 feet to a square-stone marked "No. '8'", on the easterly side of a drain, about 50 feet southerly from a spring, two sweetgum, black-gum, and elm pointers;

Thence north 27°42'10" west 1,072.50 feet to a square-stone corner marked "No. '9'", on the westerly side of a road, at a large white-oak stump, said corner no. 9 being also a corner to the properties of — Purdy and G. W. Beshear;

Thence north 9°28'20" east 703.20 feet to a square-stone corner marked "No. '10'", on an easterly hillside, in a steep hollow, 2 sweetgum, 2 white-oak, and elm pointers;

Thence north 75°30'40" east 284.06 feet to an iron-pipe corner marked "H. L. & I. Co.-G. W. Beshear-Ira Beshear-No. '1'", on a westerly hillside, about 50 feet easterly from a deep drain, black-oak and large white-oak pointers;

Such conveyance shall contain the express condition that if the Commonwealth of Kentucky shall at any time cease to use such lands for State park purposes, or shall alienate or attempt to alienate such lands, title thereto shall revert to the United States.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "purposes", insert the word "exclusively."

Page 8, line 10, strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty-five."

Page 9, line 7, after the word "purposes", insert the word "exclusively."

The committee amendments were agreed to and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

DISCHARGE FROM IMPRISONMENT FOR NONPAYMENT OF FINES IN ALASKA

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 157) to amend section 5296 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. If I understand this bill correctly, it merely puts the district courts of Alaska on the same plane with respect to the release of those who are unable to pay their fines by filing proper affidavits as they do in the district courts at the present time.

Mr. DIMOND. The statement of the gentleman is correct. That is all it does.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I withdraw my reservation of objection. There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5296 of the United States Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 641) is amended by adding thereto the following sentence: "The District Court of the Territory of Alaska shall be deemed a court of the United States, and the commissioners appointed by the judges of the said District Court of the Territory of Alaska under the provisions of title I, chapter 1, section 6, of the act of June 6, 1900 (31 Stat. L., 323, 324), shall be deemed commissioners of a United States court, within the intent and meaning of this section."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO HOMESTEADERS ON PUBLIC DOMAIN

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 5538) granting a leave of absence to settlers of homestead lands during the year 1935.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I would like to have an explanation of what is meant in line 7, page 1, by the words "and/or family."

Mr. GREEVER. That is copied from the bill of last year.

Mr. McLEAN. If the gentleman will strike out the character and the word "or", I shall not object to it.

Mr. GREEVER. That is agreeable to me.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman wish to substitute a similar Senate bill (S. 1776) for the House bill?

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute the bill S. 1776 for the House bill, with the amendment that will be offered by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Senate bill will be substituted for the House bill.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any homestead settler or entryman who, during the calendar year 1935, should find it necessary, because of economic conditions, to leave his homestead to seek employment in order to obtain the necessities of life for himself and/or family or to provide for the education of his children may, upon filing with the register of the district, his affidavit, supported by corroborating affidavits of two disinterested persons showing the necessity of such absence, be excused from compliance with the requirements of the homestead laws as to residence, cultivation, improvements, expenditures, or payment of purchase money, as the case may be, during all or any part of the calendar year 1935, and said entries shall not be open to contest or protest because of failure to comply with such requirements during such absence; except that the time of such absence shall not be deducted from the actual residence required by law, but a period equal to such absence shall be added to the statutory life of the entry: Provided, That any entryman holding an unperfected entry on ceded Indian lands may be excused from the requirements of residence upon the conditions provided herein, but shall not be entitled to extension of time for the payment of any installment of the purchase price of the land except upon payment of interest, in advance, at the rate of 4 percent per annum on the principal of any unpaid purchase price from the date when such payment or payments became due to and inclusive of the date of the expiration of the period of relief granted hereunder.

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DEROUEN: Page 2, line 14, after the word "except", insert the following: "Upon proof satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior that the entryman is acting in good faith and is financially unable to make payments due then."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEVER: Page 1, line 7, after the word "and", strike out the sign and the word "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

WHITE HOUSE POLICE FORCE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6654, to increase the White House police force, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will reserve the objection.

Mr. LANHAM. I should like to hear the reasons which the gentleman has for objecting to the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say that I have never objected to a bill yet unless I had some reason for objecting to it on the merits.

Mr. LANHAM. I am sure of that, but I wondered if I could not make some explanation that would be satisfactory to the gentleman?

Mr. WOLCOTT. At the present time I understand the law provides for 43 privates.

Mr. LANHAM. That is correct.

Mr. WOLCOTT. This bill, without putting any limitation upon the number of privates that may be appointed, authorizes the appointment of additional privates. It seems to me that, because of the openness of the law, the White House, if it saw fit, could, with the appropriation being the only limitation upon it, appoint 40 or 50 privates to the White House police force and assign them to special duty, and in that manner augment their force wholly out of keeping with what we appropriate annually for the White House force. I do not have any objection to the White House having all of the protection which it really needs. My objection is to building up a colossal force down there and using it for every possible purpose without some check by the Congress as to what they are doing. As I understand, they borrow certain policemen from the Metropolitan Police force.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Seven in number.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am heartily in favor of giving those seven men back to the Metropolitan Police department. I would be in favor of giving them back to the police department for no other reason than that the traffic in the District of Columbia might be regulated. I do not have any hesitancy in saying that all of us recognize the fact that the traffic in the Capital City is the most unregulated traffic of any city I have ever driven in. When the proper time comes, and I hope it will, I will not object to increasing the Metropolitan Police force for the purpose of regulating traffic, if for no other reason. If the gentleman will limit the number of policemen that the White House is authorized to put on, then I may consider the withdrawal of my objection.

I might say that that, in substance, is my objection.

Mr. LANHAM. May I say to the gentleman that I raised exactly the same question in the committee. This law has been amended several times. In view of the fact that the Appropriations Committee would have to pass upon any number of men in making the appropriation for them, and in order that it may not be necessary for the White House force to be coming for an amendment each time it is necessary to put on a man or two it was urged that the number be left indefinite. The Metropolitan Police force is very anxious to have the seven men back. There are 12 men who are necessary in addition to the 43 at present in the White House force on account of the fact that additional posts have been assigned because of the extensions that have been made to the Executive offices. If the gentleman would not object to the bill if those 12 men were added, I should not object to putting in an amendment "not exceeding 55", which is the present need, as was shown very clearly before the committee.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think that would remove the principal objection which I have to the bill.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I would like to make one observation. I am afraid the President will veto this bill because of the very serious oversight whereby no provision is made that these shall be outside of the civil service.

Mr. LANHAM. As a matter of fact, this bill was drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury and sent to the Speaker and by him referred to the committee.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. But you know the President has not been in favor of any bills at all unless he has the right to appoint everybody outside the civil service.

Mr. LANHAM. The bill was introduced as sent up by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I have that amendment prepared if it is satisfactory to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I understand it is contemplated that an amendment will be offered limiting the number of privates to 55. With that understanding, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK] has an amendment prepared which will meet the objection of the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 (a) of the act entitled "An act to create the White House police force, and for other purposes", approved September 14, 1922 (42 Stat. 841), as amended by section 2 of the act entitled "An act to authorize a necessary increase in the White House police force", approved May 14, 1930 (46 Stat. 328), is hereby further amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 2. (a) That the White House police force shall consist of 1 captain with grade corresponding to that of captain (Metropolitan Police), 1 lieutenant with grade corresponding to that of lieutenant (Metropolitan Police), 3 sergeants with grade corresponding to that of sergeant (Metropolitan Police); and of such number of privates, with grade corresponding to that of private, class 3 (Metropolitan Police), as may be necessary. Members of the White House police shall be appointed from the members of the Metropolitan Police force and the United States Park Police force from lists furnished by the officers in charge of such forces. Vacancies shall be filled in the same manner."

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, line 4, strike out the comma and "class 3", and insert in lieu thereof, "of the highest grade."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a committee amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIONCHECK: Page 2, line 5, after the word "necessary", strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "but not exceeding 55 in number."

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I ask the gentleman if that would not come better after the word "privates", in line 3?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The present law has that proviso in there at the very same place. It is shown in the report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK].

The amendment was agreed to.

LXXXIX—442

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL ARCHIVES ESTABLISHMENT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6836, to provide for the printing and distribution of Government publications to the National Archives Establishment.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I want to take this time to say that I think we have made better progress on the Consent Calendar today than we have at any time since I have been looking after this work on the Republican side. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] whether the right language has been used in the title of this new branch of Government when it is called "National Archives Establishment"?

Mr. KELLER. I presume that would be the correct designation; yes. The bill was well written and well considered both by the Committee on the Library and the Archives department, and it was not reported until they agreed on the language.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I would like the gentleman's opinion on the jurisdiction of the Archives department as compared with the Library so we may know what subjects are appropriate to be referred to the one and what should be referred to the other.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman appreciates, of course, that whenever a new bureau or department is established there is always difficulty in establishing the dividing line between its activities and those of bureaus or departments already existing; but I shall endeavor to state the difference as best I can. The purpose of establishing archives is to keep intact all official documents that are governmental in nature. The Library does this, of course, but the copies in the Library are withdrawn, used, and worked over, whereas the documents filed in the archives are supposed to be absolutely permanent.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I wonder if the gentleman, with his usual thoroughness and clarity, would not go into the question further to see whether or not this designation in the title is proper, because so far as I know this is the first bill that has come up for consideration, for sometime at least, that related exclusively to the National Archives.

Mr. KELLER. I think that is correct. Officials of the Library and of the Archives Department have conferred on the whole bill very carefully, because as the bill was first written, as I suggested to the gentleman, the distinguishing line between the two was not exact. For this reason they got together and discussed the matter, and they agree on the bill.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I understand the whole Archives Department is filled with Republicans. I would like to see a few Democrats get some jobs in the outfit down there. Will the gentleman kindly tell us, if we enact this legislation, how we can get some jobs down there for Democrats?

Mr. KELLER. I am not running a job department. I presume, of course, that appointments are made by the archivists as the law provides. I know the people are employed on merit. If a Democrat is the best man, he stands the best chance; if he is not the best man, he does not.

Mr. TRUAX. Who says so?

Mr. KELLER. KELLER, of Illinois.

Mr. McFARLANE. What is the method they use to determine whether a man is well qualified. As you know, they are filling up this Department with Republicans and following the same procedure as they have in the Congressional Library. I submit there are just as many qualified Democrats—and Democrats should get the jobs—and would if we Democrats stood together and demanded it.

Mr. KELLER. I do not know of any at all.

Mr. McFARLANE. The Republicans are the ones who get the jobs down there, as well as all other departments.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman is entirely mistaken, as I happen to know.

Mr. McFARLANE. The gentleman has one man down there; I do not have any.

Mr. KELLER. That may be the gentleman's own fault.

Mr. McFARLANE. No; it is not. I have tried hard enough.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if there is not some way or some method by which the service that is to be provided under the terms of this bill can be taken care of without an appropriation of $4,000?

Mr. KELLER. No.

Mr. TRUAX. I do not want to criticize the gentleman, but it does seem to me that whenever a bill appears on the Consent Calendar from the gentleman's committee it means the expenditure of more Federal money. I wonder if we could not get one of his bills through, the purposes of which could be taken care of without the expenditure of further money?

Mr. KELLER. That will be true of the next bill to be called.

Mr. TRUAX. That is all right; but I would like some more immediate action.

Mr. KELLER. The reason the pending bill contains an authorization for printing is to pay for the cost of the paper and running it through the presses. The type is already set up in forms. This is merely to provide for the additional cost of running the paper through the presses.

Mr. TRUAX. How much money is spent for Government printing in a year?

Mr. KELLER. It is up into the millions.

Mr. TRUAX. I have read the bill carefully, and I fail to see wherein the very services proposed by the bill are not already available. Surely we can get these extra few copies for the Archives Department without a new printing.

I am glad to hear they have made some appointments down there, even if the gentleman did happen to get one.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman is wrong about the cost of these copies. If this $4,000 is not authorized, these copies will not be furnished the Archives, for the reason that Government printing is figured very closely, and this simply covers the cost of printing and paper; that is all.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I am going to make the request that this bill be passed over without prejudice, so that the gentleman can look into the matter further and ascertain whether this service cannot be furnished without an additional appropriation.

I think it is time that we should draw a line somewhere and call a halt to these tremendous expenditures for more bureaus and more bureaucrats.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman understands that this has to go through the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. TRUAX. I understand all that.

Mr. KELLER. It is just a question whether, having established the Archives Department of the United States for this very purpose, the gentleman is going to object to carrying out the law and the intent of the law that has been in the minds of the American people for nearly 100 years before this time.

Mr. TRUAX. When we established that Department and authorized an appropriation of $10,000 for the annual salary of an expert, I opposed the measure. Now the gentleman wants $4,000 more.

Mr. KELLER. Certainly; and I may say there is an appropriation coming in for more than that amount to provide for the regular work of that Department.

Mr. TRUAX. This is a new department?

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. More bureaucracy. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

EMPLOYMENT OFFICES AFFILIATED WITH UNITED STATES EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 147, to alter the amount apportioned to certain States for public employment offices affiliated with the United States Employment Service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I say that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] is so affable in everything that he does that it is with regret that I call his attention to a mistake in this report, which is susceptible to a point of order. The gentleman has not complied with the rules; but, because he is so gracious to everybody, I am not going to raise the point.

Mr. CONNERY. May I ask the gentleman where?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman failed to observe the Ramseyer rule. Of course, this bill comes from the other body and it does not stand us in good stead to criticize them. I have had this matter up with the drafting service, and they say it is in bad form.

Mr. CONNERY. It came from the other body. It would not be in bad form if it came from the House.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 (a) of the so-called "Wagner-Peyser Act" (Act of June 6, 1933, ch. 49; 48 Stat. 113, 114; U. S. Code, title 30, sec. 49 (d)) be amended by adding at the end of the second sentence thereof the following clause: "Provided, however, That in apportioning said 75 percent of amounts appropriated after January 1, 1935, under this act, the Director shall apportion not less than $10,000 to each State."

so that, as amended, section 5 (a) shall read as follows:

"For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated (1) the sum of $1,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, (2) $4,000,000 for each fiscal year thereafter up to and including the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, (3) and thereafter such sums annually as the Congress may deem necessary. Seventy-five percent of the amounts appropriated under this act shall be apportioned by the director among the several States in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the States of the United States according to the next preceding United States census, to be available for the purpose of establishing and maintaining systems of public employment offices in the several States and the political subdivisions thereof in accordance with the provisions of this act: Provided, however, That in apportioning said 75 percent of amounts appropriated after January 1, 1935, under this act, the director shall apportion not less than $10,000 to each State. No payment shall be made in any year out of the amount of such appropriations apportioned to any State until an equal sum has been appropriated or otherwise made available for that year by the State, or by any agency thereof, including appropriations made by local subdivisions, for the purpose of maintaining public employment offices as a part of a State-controlled system of public employment offices; except that the amounts so appropriated by the State shall not be less than 25 percent of the apportionment according to population made by the director for each State for the current year, and in no event less than $5,000. The balance of the amounts appropriated under this act shall be available for all the purposes of this act other than for apportionment among the several States as herein provided."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MEMORIAL TO JEAN JULES JUSSERAND

The Clerk called the next resolution, House Joint Resolution 204, authorizing the erection of a memorial to the late Jean Jules Jusserand.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] how much money this is going to cost?

Mr. KELLER. Not a cent.

Mr. TRUAX. Then I have no objection to the bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant permission for the erection on public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington, other than those of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, and the White House, of a memorial of simple and artistic form to the late Jean Jules Jusserand, by his friends in America in memory and esteem of his fine friendship for the United States and its people during the 22 years of his service in Washington: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the memorial shall have the approval of the National Commission of Fine Arts, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of the said memorial.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WASHINGTON-LINCOLN MEMORIAL GETTYSBURG BOULEVARD

The Clerk called the next resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 43, for the establishment of a commission for the construction of a Washington-Lincoln Memorial Gettysburg Boulevard connecting the present Lincoln Memorial in the city of Washington with the battlefield of Gettysburg, in the State of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I am not going to object—the Roads Committee has put itself in position to give us another great thoroughfare in this country which will probably cost many thousand dollars per mile. The Roads Committee has not seen fit in this session of Congress to do anything to relieve the people who live out in the country on the rural bus routes and the rural mail routes. I should like to see the Roads Committee take up that fight, which is a real fight and a meritorious fight. I for one have become tired of appropriating money for these main thoroughfares and leaving the poor man out in the highways and byways without an opportunity to get out. I am not blaming that committee altogether. I do hope that committee wakes up and demands its rights. I have had occasion on the floor to speak about this matter a number of times. I blame the State authorities and the Federal highway director for their refusal to appreciate the situation in which these poor people find themselves.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may say that the Roads Committee reported out a very fine bill previous to the enactment of the relief bill which would have accomplished just what the gentleman desires in respect to secondary roads, but it was not given consideration. As I understand the matter, this was due to the fact that the Senate in its wisdom wrote a highway provision into the relief bill, which, in the absence of an opportunity to pass any road bill, we had to accept.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Is there any allocation of Federal money for secondary roads under existing law?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I do not understand there is, but under the bill reported by the Roads Committee there would have been a goodly portion for secondary roads.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I recall that in a bill reported in the last Congress there was a definite allocation of at least 25 percent to secondary roads. I recall also the interest of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] in the amendment which was adopted at that time.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I thank my friend from Kentucky. He is quite right. He and many other leaders on the Democratic side helped me in that fight. We won easily, for the sentiment of Congress is overwhelmingly in favor of keeping the country people out of the mud. The trouble in Ohio has been that the State director of highways did not seem to want to heed the expressed wish of Congress. The Federal Highway Director must have been in sympathy with him, for instead of spending this 25 percent on rural roads, as they should have done, they ordered that it should be spent on a small piece of road in each county, this piece to be about 5 miles long and constructed with about the same specifications as a main road. They utterly refused to go out into the country and arrange for the stopping up of mudholes. The Roads Committee has before them now a bill which will cure this whole thing. If they would take it up and pass this bill, it would amend the organic law, and henceforth 25 percent of all money appropriated for public roads would go to these country highways. This bill was introduced by me. It has the approval of the best roadmen of the country. I think it is the solution of this road problem. If it would pass, it would provide that 25 percent of all Federal money must be spent on rural roads. It would take the matter out of the hands of these bureaucrats who want to do nothing except provide for main thoroughfares so that they can get their names on the big beautiful cement bridges. I commend this bill to the Roads Committee. I am perfectly willing to relinquish authorship to it in favor of any member of the committee.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. When the gentleman refers to country roads, he is referring to feeder roads or home-to-market roads.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes, sir; that is exactly what I mean. The gentleman has plenty of them in his district and I have plenty in mine.

Mr. ENGEL. I took this matter up with a certain official here in the Department. I have forgotten his name.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. McDonald, I presume.

Mr. ENGEL. I spoke to some captain over there, and he informed me that they were setting aside 25 percent of the money appropriated for the public-works program for secondary roads, defining secondary roads as being non-Federal-aid roads, and also excluding from secondary roads such roads as were primary State trunk-line roads.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I do not like to take the words out of the gentleman's mouth, but here is the way they interpret that. They put upon that the requirement that none of the money shall be applied to less expensive construction than $3,000 or $4,000 per mile.

Mr. ENGEL. All I know about it is just what they told me.

Mr. KELLER. Is it not a fact that at the very present moment the various road authorities of the various States are at work on this matter and have worked out a plan along the line the gentleman speaks of which will use Federal relief money for this very purpose on a very large scale?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I hope the gentleman is right about it, but I will have to know more than that about it before I put much dependence in it.

Mr. KELLER. I am entirely right about it.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Heretofore the enactments of Congress have not been worth a thing. They have ignored us just as if we were nothing. If the Republican Party was in power I would straighten them out or know the reason why.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. As one member of the House Committee on Roads at this time I want to pay my tribute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECREST], a colleague of the gentleman who now has the floor. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECREST] forced through the Committee on Roads an amendment which would make it mandatory to apply this money to the feeder roads or the farm-to-market roads and for this reason I believe the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECREST] ought to be mentioned in this connection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I may say that the gentleman referred to followed the old Jenkins amendment which we passed here a year or two ago. His amendment was right in line with the amendment we passed at that time and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECREST] deserves the credit which the gentleman seeks to give him. His district adjoins mine and he knows our needs thoroughly.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Ohio will permit, the Committee on Roads, at their sessions, did provide in the bill they reported $300,000,000 for real farm-to-market roads. When this bill came out, the superintendents of highways and the heads of departments of public works in the different States heard of it and they came rushing to Washington and succeeded in taking this up with one or more of the Senators and getting this portion of the bill eliminated. So the bill as it is today has no appropriation for real farm-to-market roads.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman is quite right.

Mr. LORD. It does save the first- and second-class roads, but it does not apply at all to the real farm-to-market roads. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECREST] had an amendment providing for bus lines and for rural mail-delivery roads, and this was put in the bill, but it was later on cut out and we have no such provision now, and the farmer is still in the mud.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am in entire accord with the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio. I simply want to add that we are appropriating a large sum of money for the Rural Mail Delivery Service to the people in the country sections of every State in the Union, and in view of the fact that we are losing money on this Service, and for the reason that we are appropriating a large sum of money for the improvement of roads, we ought to receive preferential consideration from the State highway commissioners in connection with the improvement of post roads and rural-delivery roads. This has not been done in the past. I am pleased that this discussion has been made on the floor of the House, because it is a matter that should be brought to the attention of the State and Federal commissioners of highways and other authorities throughout the country.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I may say to the gentleman that while I do not want to take any credit to myself, yet in my district we organized along this line 2 years ago, and we went to see our Governor with a delegation of 250 people, and we thought we had the matter all worked out, but the C. W. A. came along and took it away from us.

The gentleman has hit the nail on the head. The trouble has been that regardless of what we do here these high road officers do not pay much attention to us. We have had no trouble in passing these amendments referred to. The Jenkins amendment was passed in a Democratic House overwhelmingly. There is no question about it but that these authorities are sold on this one proposition of having main thoroughfares. They want these three- or four-lane highways, and these Government men will tell you that they ought not to spend any money on improving a road where the specifications do not call for an expenditure of at least $4,000 a mile. This is not what we want; we want some plan that will make the country roads passable in the winter.

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman is quite correct.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby established a commission to be known as the United States Commission for the construction of a Washington-Lincoln-Memorial Gettysburg Boulevard connecting the present Lincoln Memorial in the city of Washington with the battlefield of Gettysburg in the State of Pennsylvania (hereinafter referred to as the Commission), and to be composed of 10 commissioners, as follows: The President of the United States; Presiding Officer of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the president of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, ex officio; 2 persons to be appointed by the President of the United States; 1 Senator from the State of Maryland and 1 Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, to be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate; and 1 Representative from the State of Maryland and 1 from the State of Pennsylvania, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The commissioners shall serve without compensation and shall select a chairman from among their number.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to be expended by the Commission in accordance with the provisions of this resolution.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the commission to prepare a plan or plans to further commemorate the public services of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln by the construction of a boulevard or highway connecting the present Lincoln Memorial and the Washington Monument in the city of Washington with the Gettysburg battlefield in the State of Pennsylvania; and to give due and proper consideration to any plan or plans which may be submitted to it.

SEC. 4. That the commission, after selecting a chairman and a vice chairman from among its members, may employ a secretary and such other assistants as may be needed for clerical work connected with the duties of the commission and may also engage the services of expert advisers, and may fix their respective compensations within the amount appropriated for such purposes.

SEC. 5. That the commissioners shall be paid their actual and necessary traveling, hotel, and other expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties out of the amount appropriated.

SEC. 6. That the commission shall on or before 1 year after the date of enactment of this resolution, make a report to the Congress, in order that enabling legislation may be enacted.

SEC. 7. That the term of commission hereby created shall expire within 1 year after the completion of the proposed boulevard or highway.

SEC. 8. This joint resolution shall take effect immediately.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "of", strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirteen."

Page 2, line 8, after the word "Senate", insert the words "The Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, Department of Agriculture; the Director, National Park Service, Department of the Interior; Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia."

Page 2, line 23, after the word "plans", insert the words "In cooperation with the Bureau of Public Roads, Department of Agriculture; the Highway Departments of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and District of Columbia."

Page 3, line 22, after the word "enacted", insert the words "Provided, Such enabling legislation stipulates that the said highway or boulevard shall be constructed by the Highway Departments of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and District of Columbia, under the supervision of the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, Department of Agriculture, from funds provided by the said State of Pennsylvania, the said State of Maryland, and the District of Columbia, including any future allocation of Federal-aid highway funds or grants to the said States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and to the District of Columbia. The passage of this act does not commit the United States to build the said highway or boulevard at Federal expense, and, if authorized, the Federal funds for the construction of the said highway or boulevard will be the allocations that may accrue to the said States and the District of Columbia in future appropriations of Federal-aid highway and grant funds. Any appropriations under the authority of this act shall be deducted from the next regular apportionment or allocation of Federal-aid highway funds or Federal-grant highway funds, under existing or future authorizations as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture to Pennsylvania, Maryland, and the District of Columbia."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BUILDING FOR DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR ESTABLISHMENT AT HELSINGFORS, FINLAND

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 4448, to provide funds for the acquisition of a site, erection of buildings and furnishing thereof for the use of the diplomatic and consular establishments of the United States at Helsingfors, Finland.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Reserving the right to object, this bill proposes to expend $300,000 to acquire a site to erect buildings for the American Legation in Finland. I realize that Finland was practically the only foreign nation that paid her war debt in full. But that is no good reason why this country should immediately expend $300,000 as a return for that payment. The report says that the Government is now paying $11,000 per year rent for quarters that they now use. If we spend $300,000 at 4 percent, that will be $12,000 per year for bankers who buy tax-exempt bonds. That would represent $12,000 a year, and so it is cheaper to rent at $11,000 a year. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman from Ohio says about 4 percent is all bunk. The gentleman's statement that it would cost more is not borne out by the facts. I am going to object to this bill being passed over without prejudice. If the gentleman wants to object, let him object.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object. The taxpayers do not think a $300,000 unwarranted appropriation is "bunk." They ultimately foot the bill for all the tax-exempt bonds issued by the Government.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. I object.

WHITE SWAN SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 88, YAKIMA COUNTY, WASH.

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 4297, to provide funds for cooperation with White Swan School District No. 88, Yakima County, Wash., for extension of public-school buildings to be available for Indian children of the Yakima Reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Reserving the right to object, there are on the calendar several bills to provide for school-district aid. The calendar numbers are 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 85, 86, 87, and 92.

The amounts authorized under these bills aggregate $761,000. They are along the same lines. I have had several conversations with Members who are interested in these bills and, although I am somewhat, not wholly, convinced as to the merit of the legislation, I feel that it should be presented to us in an entirely different manner.

I am going to ask unanimous consent that these bills, the calendar numbers of which I have read, be passed over without prejudice.

I have in mind that the committee should bring these bills in in an omnibus bill, with a rule allowing some time for debate, in order that we have the question settled once and for all definitely concerning the policy of Congress with respect to aid in these districts. I think that perhaps the aid should be given, but I think a great deal of time and consideration should be given to it.

For the purpose of giving the committee time to bring in an omnibus bill, together with a rule for the consideration, I ask unanimous consent that the bills, Calendar Nos. 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 85, 86, 87, 92, and 113 be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Reserving the right to object, I want to bring out another thought. The gentleman from Michigan recommends that the committee bring them out in an omnibus bill. Has the gentleman given any consideration to the fact that it might be that the Committee on Appropriations dealing with Indian Affairs, that is the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations in charge of the Department of the Interior, should be consulted with reference to these matters, because this is establishing a new policy, and we ought to start on it right so that both committees may consider it, and when it does come in as an omnibus bill then there will be no objection and we will have a definite program. With this idea of every individual Congressman coming here for a new schoolhouse for sections in his own district one can see how expensive it will be before we get through. This should be considered carefully with the idea of formulating a statesmanlike policy that we can all be proud of.

Mr. AYERS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Wolcott] that this bill go over, and I desire to discuss this bill and the companion bills for a few minutes. The gentleman is entirely right in his figures on these bills. They seek an authorization of $751,000 in the aggregate. The Committee on Indian Affairs has had a special subcommittee that investigated every one of these bills. That subcommittee had hearings at the last session and at this session. The allocation of this $751,000 has to do today with 2,889 Indian children, and here is how it has to do with them: Some years ago the Indian Department adopted a policy to abandon and suspend Indian schools and send the Indian children to State schools. This policy has been consistently followed. For instance, the Indian school which was abandoned at Rapid City, S. Dak., last year sent back to three reservations in my district 89 Indian children of high-school age; all must now go to the State high schools or be deprived of any further education.

This policy of the Indian Department has forced the Indian children into State schools if they are to gain any education, and it has prevailed whether the State schools be located within the boundaries of Indian reservations or on adjoining land. This policy has proved eminently satisfactory for the education of the Indian children, and it has led to the abandonment of additional Indian schools.

In Montana, where I am most familiar with the schools affected, a commendable spirit of cooperation with the Indian Department on the part of the local school boards has always taken place. However, the burden assumed by the local school districts has become greater than their carrying capacities, and additions to the present buildings or new buildings must be constructed if the districts are to carry on under this policy.

Naturally, by reason of Indian-owned lands, the schools, utilized to the greatest extent by Indian children, find themselves without available funds and without security to raise additional funds to build additions to present buildings or to construct new buildings. You are all aware that Indian lands are not assessable.

These school districts had previously provided buildings and equipment sufficient for accommodation of the white patrons; and now, by reason of the increased attendance brought about by their cooperation with the Indian Department, they are totally inadequate to pursue this policy further without help. Additions and new buildings must be had. In many instances basements, sheds, and other nondescript buildings are being used for school purposes when, in fact, they are unfit for such purposes.

In all instances the feeling between the white people, who are the taxpayers and who have borne the burden with reference to buildings, furniture, laboratories, books, and other equipment, on the one hand and the Indian children and the Indian population on the other hand has been very amicable. Indeed, there has never been any evidence of racial prejudice. The Indian children have been accepted and retained in these schools upon exactly the same basis as white children.

Because of the importance of this bill and other similar bills now on this Consent Calendar, a subcommittee was appointed to consider all of these Indian educational bills. I had the honor to be chairman of that subcommittee. We made an extended investigation of the situation. We found that the Government is paying a tuition averaging 40 cents per capita per school day for the Indian children attending these State schools. Assuming that a school year is 9 months of 20 days each, the Government is paying $72 per capita per year. We found that this average tuition is less than the average per capita cost for overhead, leaving a condition where the district is compelled to bear the burden of the overhead shortage in addition to bearing all the burden for buildings, furniture, laboratories, and upkeep.

We found that the average per capita cost for elementary and secondary education in the United States is \$87.67 per annum. This is the average; it varies in different States. This makes an average daily per capita cost throughout the Nation of 48 $\frac{3}{4}$ cents per day for overhead as against an average of 40 cents per day paid by the Government for Indian children attending these public schools. The per capita cost per annum in Montana is \$102.62, or 57 cents per day. Hence the average annual Government tuition paid in that State is \$32.62 or 17 cents per day less than the actual per capita cost.

In the State of Washington, the average per capita cost is $98.64 per annum. The White Swan School District in the State of Washington, which is involved in the instant bill, embraces 442,986 acres of Indian-owned land which is nonassessable, as against 46,974 acres of white-owned land which is on the assessment rolls. A majority of the attendants at the White Swan School are Indian children and this vast amount of Indian land bears none of the burden of the building or maintenance charges whatever—the small amount of white-owned land has to carry the entire burden. The school is now overcrowded to such an extent that new buildings will have to be built or additions constructed to the present buildings. Certainly, no one can contend that this small percentage of white-owned land should bear that entire burden.

The same condition exists, only on different ratios, in all of the schools involved in these bills.

At Poplar, Mont., a substantial majority of the school attendance is Indian and a large percentage of the lands within the district is Indian owned and nonassessable.

At Wolf Point, Mont., which is the county seat of a county made up largely of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation and where the district is bonded practically to its constitutional limitation, the Indian Department advises us that there are now about 150 Indian children in attendance at the school and that some 25 to 50 additional Indian children would attend if there were building facilities.

At Lodge Grass, Mont., where two-thirds of the land in the district is Indian owned and nonassessable, 133 Indian children are in attendance as against 243 white children, according to the department reports. The district is bonded to its full constitutional limit and the reports show that the school buildings are in bad condition and are all overcrowded; that two dark and poorly ventilated basement rooms are used. Like reports disclose similar conditions at the Frazer, Mont., school, and, as a matter of fact, similar conditions exist at all of the schools which these bills seek to assist.

Mr. Speaker, present reports disclose that there are 2,889 Indian children now attending the public schools mentioned in these bills. Now the time will soon arrive when these Indian children will have to be excluded from these schools unless some action in the way of relief is taken on the part of Congress. By the use of the funds sought for these school districts, additional buildings can be provided not only to accommodate these present 2,889 Indian children but to accommodate an increased Indian attendance at a cost of approximately $265 per Indian child. This is much less than the Government could undertake to build Indian schoolhouses, which it will ultimately have to do unless these bills are passed.

Our committee has held extensive hearings and gone into the facts concerning all of these bills, and I am certain that they are meritorious.

The enactment of this legislation, in addition to assisting the Indian Department in its policy of giving the Indian pupils the benefit of the environment of attending school with white children, is in effect and from a money point of view an economy move. The Federal Government, by closing the Indian schools it formerly maintained and assigning the Indian children to State schools, has already effected economies much greater than the expenditures proposed by these bills. And please bear in mind that the expenditures proposed by these bills would not be a recurring item, but in the nature of a capital investment. It would give the Department an interest in the buildings constructed or the buildings upon which additions were made, and according to all the bills, the State schools must continue to take Indian children on the same basis as white children, with the exception of tuition to defray overhead expense, and expenditures under these bills must be made subject to conditions prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; hence, all necessary safeguards are thrown around the Government's investment in each instance, and please continue to bear in mind it is a capital investment.

If this legislation is not enacted, it will undoubtedly be necessary for the Indian Department to establish an Indian school program. This will be necessary because it is becoming impossible for the public schools to accommodate the increasing Indian attendance and it is now impossible for the public schools to construct the necessary additional improvements because of their limited taxable values in the respective districts. Surely it is not believed that the public schools of the States should be asked to carry this additional burden, belonging entirely to the Government in the education of their wards living and residing upon nonassessable lands.

Unless the relief proposed by these bills is brought about, the Indian Department will be compelled to reestablish and maintain Indian schools. And let me add that the per capita cost, now paid by the Government for overhead in these State schools in the way of tuition, will be more than trebled should it build Indian schools and attempt to run them on a departmental basis; hence this is economy legislation from any and all points of view.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I am in accord with what the gentleman says, and I am sympathetic concerning its program, and, without committing myself as to what I would do, I think perhaps I might be able to give the gentleman some help, but it is with a great deal of sincerity that I think the committee should give consideration to putting these bills in an omnibus bill and presenting them to the House so that the gentleman will have time and we will all have time to bring out the thoughts that we have. For that reason, I ask that these bills go over without prejudice.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. It has been suggested that perhaps the Committee on Appropriations might make appropriations for these proposals, but these bills are merely an authorization for an appropriation. It was clearly within the rights of the committee to consider these bills, and, for the benefit of the gentleman, I will say that most of these bills have already passed the Senate. The first bill called here, H. R. 4297, passed the Senate on April 15, and every one of these bills which have been introduced in the Senate has passed the Senate. Two or three have not been introduced.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then, if we do bring in an omnibus bill and establish a policy which we could follow, I do not anticipate we would have any trouble in the Senate with respect to the passage of an omnibus bill which included bills already passed by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan that these bills be passed over without prejudice?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to object to the unanimous-consent request, but we would like to pass these bills at the first opportunity. I realize that when I object to the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman I am probably compelling the gentleman to object to the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Of course I shall, although I do not want to object to it. I have no objection to the merits of the bill, and I do not like to object to these bills unless I have some objection to their merits. It is merely the manner in which it is brought up. I am asking that they go over without prejudice so that we can give some consideration to bringing them in in an omnibus bill.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. These bills have been considered in the same manner that all other bills of the same nature are considered.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. And they have been considered for over a year.

Mr. WOLCOTT. They were on the calendar this last year, and the same question arose as to what the policy of the Congress would be with respect to them.

I am not going to take the responsibility and I do not think the gentleman wants to take the responsibility, under unanimous consent, of establishing a policy for this House to follow in the future with reference to these bills.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. It passed the Senate last year. It has passed the Senate this year. It has been passed by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs. The Indian Department is in favor of it. It has been here a year now, and if we keep on objecting to this, there will have to be a special bill—

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am not objecting. I hope the gentleman will appreciate the fact that I am not objecting. I am simply giving his committee an opportunity to consider bringing these bills in in an omnibus bill.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. It will not be necessary to do that, these bills are on the Union Calendar—

The regular order was demanded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Wolcott]?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLIC-SCHOOL BUILDING AT POPLAR, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5207, for expenditure of funds for cooperation with the public-school board at Poplar, Mont., in the construction or improvement of public-school building to be available to Indian children of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. I object, Mr. Speaker. If the gentleman from Michigan wants to play politics on these bills—

Mr. WOLCOTT. I hope the gentleman will not consider that I am trying to play politics.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLIC-SCHOOL BUILDING AT BROCKTON, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5209, to provide funds for cooperation with the school board at Brockton, Mont., in the extension of the public-school building at that place to be available to Indian children of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLIC-SCHOOL BUILDING, BIG HORN COUNTY, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5210, to provide funds for cooperation with school district no. 17-H, Big Horn County, Mont., for extension of public-school buildings to be available to Indian children.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLIC SCHOOL AT FRAZER, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5212, to authorize appropriation for the completion of the public high school at Frazer, Mont.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 27, BIG HORN COUNTY, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5213, to provide funds for cooperation with school district no. 27, Big Horn County, Mont., for extension of public-school buildings to be available to Indian children.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLIC SCHOOL AT WOLF POINT, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5214, to provide funds for cooperation with the public-school board at Wolf Point, Mont., in the construction or improvement of a public-school building to be available to Indian children of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

HARLEM SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 12, BLAINE COUNTY, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5216, to provide funds for cooperation with Harlem School District No. 12, Blaine County, Mont., for extension of public-school buildings and equipment to be available for Indian children.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 28, LAKE AND MISSOULA COUNTIES, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5500, to provide funds for cooperation with joint school district no. 28, Lake and Missoula Counties, Mont., for extension of public-school buildings to be available to Indian children of the Flathead Indian Reservation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PUBLIC-SCHOOL BUILDING AT MEDICINE LAKE, SHERIDAN COUNTY, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6315, to provide funds for cooperation with the school board at Medicine Lake, Mont., in construction of a public-school building to be available to Indian children of the village of Medicine Lake, Sheridan County, Mont.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. McFARLANE. Reserving the right to object—

Mr. WERNER. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is it going to be the attitude of the gentleman from Michigan to object to all these bills or to ask that they be passed over?

The SPEAKER. Regular order is demanded. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ROCKY BOY INDIAN RESERVATION

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3811, to add certain public-domain land in Montana to the Rocky Boy Indian Reservation.

Mr. AYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a similar Senate bill (S. 613) be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the Senate bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That approximately 557 acres of public-domain land in the State of Montana, described as lots 2, 4, 6, and 8, section 25; lots 2, 4, 6, and 8, section 26; lots 2, 4, 6, and 8, section 27; lots 2, 3, and 4, section 28; lot 5, section 29, township 28 north, range 15 east; lots 2, 4, 6, and 8, section 27; lots 2, 4, 6, and 8, section 28; lots 2, 4, 6, and 8, section 29; lots 5, 7, 9, and 11, section 30, township 28 north, range 16 east, of the Montana meridian, in Montana, be, and the same are hereby, withdrawn from the public domain and added to the Rocky Boy Indian Reservation: Provided, That the rights and claims of bona fide settlers initiated under the public-land laws prior to January 6, 1934, shall not be affected by this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider and a similar House bill were laid on the table.

PETERSBURG, ALASKA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6085, to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to undertake certain municipal public works, including the filling, grading, and paving of streets and sidewalks and construction of necessary bridges and viaducts in connection with the same, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $40,000.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the incorporated town of Petersburg, Territory of Alaska, is hereby authorized and empowered to undertake the municipal works hereinabove specified, to wit: The filling, regrading, and paving of streets and sidewalks, and the construction of bridges and viaducts, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any amount not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $40,000.

Sec. 2. Before said bonds shall be issued a special election shall be ordered by the common council of the said town of Petersburg, Alaska, at which election the question of whether such bonds shall be issued in the amount above specified for any or all of the purposes hereinbefore set forth, shall be submitted to the qualified electors of said town of Petersburg, Alaska, whose names appear on the last assessment roll of said town for purposes of municipal taxation. The form of the ballot shall be such that the electors may vote for or against the issuance of bonds for the purposes therein specified in the maximum amount herein authorized or any lesser amount. Not less than 20 days' notice of such election shall be given to the public by posting notices of the same in three conspicuous places within the corporate limits of the town of Petersburg, Alaska, one of which shall be at the front door of the United States post office at Petersburg, Alaska. The election notice shall specifically state the amount of bonds proposed to be issued for the purposes herein specified. The registration of such election, the manner of conducting the same, and the canvass of the returns of said election shall be, as nearly as practicable, in accordance with the requirements of law in general or special elections in said municipality; and said bonds shall be issued for the purposes herein authorized only upon condition that not less than 50 percent of votes cast at such election in said municipality shall be in favor of the issuance of said bonds for such purpose.

Sec. 3. The bonds herein authorized to be issued shall be coupon in form and shall mature in not to exceed 30 years from the date thereof. Such bonds may bear such date or dates, may be in such denomination or denominations, may mature in such amounts and at such time or times, not exceeding 30 years from the date thereof, may be payable in such medium of payment and at such place or places, may be sold at either public or private sale, and may be nonredeemable or redeemable (either with or without premium), may carry such registration privileges as to principal and interest, principal only, or interest only, as shall be prescribed by the common council of said town of Petersburg. The bonds shall bear the signatures of the mayor and of the clerk of the town of Petersburg and shall have impressed thereon the official seal of said municipality. The coupons to be annexed to such bonds shall bear the facsimile signatures of the mayor and the town clerk of said municipality. In case any of the officers whose signatures or countersignatures appear on the bonds shall cease to be such officers before delivery of such bonds, such signatures or countersignatures, whether manual or facsimile, shall nevertheless be valid and sufficient for all purposes, the same as if said officers had remained in office until such delivery. Said bonds shall bear interest at a rate to be fixed by the common council of the town of Petersburg, not to exceed, however, 6 percent per annum, payable semiannually, and said bonds shall be sold at not less than the principal amount thereof plus accrued interest.

Sec. 4. The bonds herein authorized to be issued shall be general obligations of the town of Petersburg, Territory of Alaska, payable as to both principal and interest from ad valorem taxes which shall be levied upon all of the taxable property within the corporate limits of such municipality in an amount sufficient to pay the interest on and the principal of such bonds as and when the same become due and payable.

Sec. 5. No part of the funds arising from the sale of said bonds shall be used for any purpose or purposes other than those specified in this act. Said bonds shall be sold only when and in such amounts as the common council of the town of Petersburg shall direct; and the proceeds thereof shall be disbursed only for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned and under the orders and directions of said common council from time to time as such proceeds may be required for such purposes.

Sec. 6. The incorporated town of Petersburg is hereby authorized to enter into contracts with the United States of America or any agency or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act and acts amendatory thereof and acts supplemental thereto, and revisions thereof, and the regulations made in pursuance thereof, and under any further acts of the Congress of the United States to encourage public works or relieve unemployment, for the sale of bonds issued in accordance with the provisions of this act or for the acceptance of a grant of money to aid said municipality in financing any public works herein authorized; or to enter into contracts with any persons or corporations, public or private, for the sale of such bonds; and such contracts may contain such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by and between the common council of said town of Petersburg and the United States of America, or any agency or instrumentality thereof or any such purchaser.

Sec. 7. This act shall take effect immediately.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "sidewalks", add the following: "The construction and improvements of sewers."

Page 5, line 9, after the word "unemployment", insert the following: "including the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DIMOND: Page 1, amend the title of the bill to read as follows:

"A bill to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to undertake certain municipal public works, including the filling, grading, and paving of streets and sidewalks, the construction and improvement of sewers, and construction of necessary bridges and viaducts in connection with the same, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $40,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

VALDEZ, ALASKA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6723, to authorize the incorporated town of Valdez, Alaska, to construct a public-school building and for such purpose to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $50,000; and to authorize said town to accept grants of money to aid it in financing any public works.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the incorporated town of Valdez, Territory of Alaska, is hereby authorized and empowered to construct a public-school building, and for such purpose to issue bonds in any amount not exceeding the sum of $50,000.

Sec. 2. Before said bonds shall be issued a special election shall be ordered by the common council of the said town of Valdez, Alaska, at which election the question of whether such bonds shall be issued in the amount above specified for the purpose hereinbefore set forth shall be submitted to the qualified electors of said town of Valdez, Alaska, whose names appear on the last assessment roll of said town for purposes of municipal taxation. The form of the ballot shall be such that the electors may vote for or against the issuance of bonds for the purpose herein specified in the amount herein authorized. Not less than 20 days' notice of such election shall be given to the public by posting notices of the same in three conspicuous places within the corporate limits of the town of Valdez, Alaska, one of which shall be at the front door of the United States post office at Valdez, Alaska. The election notice shall specifically state the amount of bonds proposed to be issued for the purpose herein specified. The registration for such election, the manner of conducting the same, and the canvass of the returns of said election shall be, as nearly as practicable, in accordance with the requirements of law in general or special elections in said municipality; and said bonds shall be issued for the purpose herein authorized only upon condition that not less than a majority of the votes cast at such election in said municipality shall be in favor of the issuance of said bonds for such purpose.

Sec. 3. The bonds herein authorized shall be coupon in form and shall mature in not to exceed 30 years from the date thereof. Such bonds may bear such date or dates, may be in such denomination or denominations, may mature in such amounts and at such time or times, not exceeding 30 years from the date thereof, may be payable in such medium of payment and at such place or places, may be sold at either public or private sale, may be non-redeemable or redeemable (either with or without premium), and may carry such registration privileges as to either principal and interest, principal only, or both, as shall be prescribed by the common council of said town of Valdez. The bonds shall bear the signatures of the mayor and of the clerk of the town of Valdez, and shall have impressed thereon the official seal of said municipality. The coupons to be annexed to such bonds shall bear the facsimile signatures of the mayor and of the clerk of said municipality. In case any of the officers whose signatures or countersignatures appear on the bonds shall cease to be such officers before delivery of such bonds, said signatures or countersignatures, whether manual or facsimile, shall, nevertheless, be valid and sufficient for all purposes, the same as if said officers had remained in office until such delivery. Said bonds shall bear interest at a rate to be fixed by the common council of the town of Valdez, not to exceed, however, 6 percent per annum, payable semiannually, and said bonds shall be sold at not less than the principal amount plus accrued interest.

Sec. 4. The bonds herein authorized to be issued shall be general obligations of the town of Valdez, Territory of Alaska, payable as to both interest and principal from ad valorem taxes which shall be levied upon all of the taxable property within the corporate limits of such municipality in an amount sufficient to pay the interest on and the principal of such bonds as and when the same become due and payable.

Sec. 5. No part of the funds arising from the sale of said bonds shall be used for any purpose or purposes other than that specified in this act. Said bonds shall be sold only when and in such amounts as the common council of the town of Valdez shall direct; and the proceeds thereof shall be distributed only for the purpose hereinbefore mentioned and under the orders and direction of said common council from time to time as such proceeds may be required for said purpose.

Sec. 6. The town of Valdez is hereby authorized to enter into contracts with the United States of America or any agency or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act and acts amendatory thereof and acts supplemental thereto, and revisions thereof, and the regulations made in pursuance thereof, and under any further acts of the Congress of the United States to encourage public works, for the relief of unemployment, or for any other public purpose, for the sale of bonds issued in accordance with the provisions of this act, or for the acceptance of a grant of money to aid said municipality in financing any public works; or to enter into contracts with any persons or corporations, public or private, for the sale of such bonds; and such contracts may contain such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by and between the common council of said town of Valdez and the United States of America or any agency or instrumentality thereof, or any such purchaser.

Sec. 7. This act shall take effect immediately.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 5, line 3, after the word "purposes" insert: "including the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ROUND VALLEY RESERVATION, CALIF.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1395, to provide funds for cooperation with the public-school board at Covelo, Calif., in the construction of public-school buildings to be available to Indian children of the Round Valley Reservation, Calif.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, in order to keep the record clear, I object to the unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LEIF ERIKSON

The Clerk called the next resolution, House Joint Resolution 26, requesting the President to proclaim October 9 as Leif Ericson Day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I call the attention of the Members to the fact that this is similar to a bill which was vetoed by the President and which established a Pulaski Day, the only difference being this sets aside a particular day in 1935 and that bill, as I understand it, set aside a certain day for each year. I have no objection to this bill, because I think we should give consideration and proper recognition to this outstanding Norwegian, Leif Erikson; but I wonder if the Members have given consideration to the fact it is useless for us to pass this measure in view of the President's attitude toward setting aside a specific day for this purpose?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, the committee has two amendments, which specifically provide that this day will only be set aside this year. There is a correction in the spelling of the name also. We have a statute to this effect already in the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, and South Dakota, where it is a yearly observance. We are asking in this joint resolution that there be an observance to this effect only this year.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the bill and withdraw my reservation of objection in the hope that the President will take a different attitude toward this bill than he did to the bill to commemorate an outstanding Polish general, General Pulaski.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating October 9 of each year as Leif Ericson Day and calling upon officials of the Government to display the flag of the United States on all Government buildings on said date and inviting the people of the United States to observe the day in schools and churches, or other suitable places, with appropriate ceremonies.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 4, after the word "designating", strike out "October 9 of each year as Leif Ericson" and insert in lieu thereof "October 9, 1935, as Leif Erikson."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read as follows: "Joint resolution requesting the President to proclaim October 9 as Leif Erikson Day."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mrs. O'DAY for the balance of the week, on account of important business.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 130

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. BRONSON CUTTING, late a Senator from the State of New Mexico.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

BRONSON M. CUTTING

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce to the House the tragic death of the late distinguished Senator from my State of New Mexico, the Honorable BRONSON M. CUTTING. Senator BRONSON M. CUTTING has been an outstanding national figure. He has rendered a distinguished service to the State of New Mexico and its people, as well as to the Nation. He will be mourned by every man, woman, and child in our State; and I am sure every Member of this House joins me in the expression of deepest sympathy to the members of his family.

Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 213

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. BRONSON CUTTING, a Senator of the United States from the State of New Mexico.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That a committee of four members be appointed on the part of the House to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate to attend the funeral.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as members on the part of the House to attend the funeral of Hon. BRONSON M. CUTTING, a Senator of the United States from the State of New Mexico, Mr. BLANTON, Mr. DEMPSEY, Mr. PLUMLEY, and Mr. MAAS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the further resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the House do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, May 7, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

319. Under clause 2 of rule XXIV a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting two supplemental estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year 1935, one for the Civil Service Commission and one for the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, amounting to $114,500 (H. Doc. No. 170), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

Mr. DOXEY: Committee on Agriculture. H. R. 6914. A bill to authorize cooperation with the several States for the purpose of stimulating the acquisition, development, and proper administration and management of State forests and coordinating Federal and State activities in carrying out a national program of forest-land management, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 830). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Committee on Appropriations. House Joint Resolution 272. Joint resolution to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to defray certain expenses incident to the convention of the Imperial Council of the Mystic Shrine, June 8 to June 17, 1935, both inclusive; without amendment (Rept. No. 829). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LLOYD: A bill (H. R. 7909) to amend the act creating a United States Court for China and prescribing the title thereof, as amended; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DOCKWEILER: A bill (H. R. 7917) for the relief of Hackett M. Ross; to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

By Mr. GWYNNE: A bill (H. R. 7918) for the relief of Melville B. Elliott; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LUDLOW: A bill (H. R. 7919) granting pensions to E. D. Howe, W. C. Harris, and Elwood Kirkwood; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7920) authorizing the President to order Maj. Harold R. Richards, Auxiliary Reserve Corps, before a retiring board for a hearing of his case, and upon the findings of such board determine whether or not he be placed on the retired list with the rank and pay held by him at the time of his resignation; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COLDEN: A bill (H. R. 7921) for the relief of Fred C. Wasserman; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALLGREN: A bill (H. R. 7922) to provide for a survey of the Nooksack River and its tributaries, in the State of Washington, with a view to the control of its floods and to conservation of soil from erosion; to the Committee on Flood Control.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

8275. By Mr. BELL: Petition of Lieutenant Jules G. Ord Camp of Spanish War Veterans, as submitted by B. S. Holloway, of Kansas City, Mo., urging the passage of House bill 6995; to the Committee on Pensions.

8276. By Mr. DOUGHTON: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, repealing, rescinding, and vacating resolutions ratified April 10, 1935, memorializing Congress to eliminate the cotton-processing tax; to the Committee on Agriculture.

8277. By Mr. GWYNNE: Petition of sundry citizens of College Hill and Cedar Falls, Iowa, favoring House bill 6472, to outlaw block selling of motion pictures; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8278. Also, petition of sundry citizens of Readlyn, opposing passage of the bill to give the Federal Trade Commission supervision of all types of business, whether incorporated or not; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8279. Also, petition of business men of Readlyn, Iowa, protesting against enactment of the holding-company bill (H. R. 5423); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8280. By Mr. JOHNSON of Texas: Petition of Missouri Pacific Lines, by R. V. Dunbar, agent, Malone; T. E. Ellison, agent, Penelope; R. D. Elliott, agent, Irene; J. S. Renlet, agent, Italy; and J. L. Morris, agent, Maypearl, all of the State of Texas, favoring House bill 3263, regulating interstate truck and bus service; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8281. By Mr. MERRITT of New York: Petition of the Central Civic Association of Hollis, N. Y., urging Congress to enact into law the bill known as S. 2220, introduced by Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND, for the purpose of consolidating the post offices in the county of Queens, N. Y., etc.; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

8283. By Mr. REED of Illinois: Petition signed by Clarence D. Averill and 64 others, favoring adoption of Senate bill 1629 and House bill 5262, providing for regulation of interstate highway transportation; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8284. Also, resolution adopted by Du Page County Consul Veterans of Foreign Wars, Department of Illinois, approving and endorsing House bill 5224; to the Committee on the Civil Service.

8285. Also, petition signed by F. J. Thomas and 21 others, urging passage of House bill 6995, to restore to Spanish War veterans and dependents their pension status of March 19, 1933; to the Committee on Pensions.

8286. By Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts: Petition of Roosevelt Council, No. 45, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, of Lowell, Mass., urging upon Congress the favorable consideration and immediate passage of House bill 5921; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

8287. By Mr. RUDD: Petition of Arbeiter Kranken & Sterbekasse, Branch 166, twenty-eighth ward, Brooklyn, N. Y., concerning the Lundeen bill (H. R. 2827); to the Committee on Labor.

8288. By Mr. TRUAX: Petition of the Methodist Federation for Social Service of New York City, opposing alien bills broadening the powers of the Department of Labor to deport and exclude aliens for mere economic beliefs or association in organizations advocating change, of which House bills 7120, by Mr. DIES; 5839, by Mr. DICKSTEIN; and 6795, by Mr. KERR, are typical, because such measures tend to create spies and secret police of a nature inimical to the fundamental concepts of a free people; to the Committee on Immigration.

8289. Also, petition of the Methodist Federation for Social Service of New York City, opposing House bill 5845, by Mr. McCORMACK, punishing the spreading of propaganda in the Army and Navy, because such measures are potent menaces to freedom of speech and press, being easily perverted to reach persons unpopular with the authorities or opposed to the interests of powerful employers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

8290. Also, petition of the Methodist Federation for Social Service of New York City, opposing all bills commonly known as "sedition bills" making mere belief a crime, of which House bills 6427 and 2866 are typical, because new laws of this nature are wholly unnecessary, since any acts against good order or existing Government are already punishable under present laws; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

8291. Also, petition of Retail Clerks, Local 128, of Toledo, Ohio, requesting support in the retention of approved Code No. 60, Retail Trade; to the Committee on Labor.

8292. Also, petition of the Lucas County Democratic central and executive committees and county officials, by County Auditor Hale T. Shenefield, asking support of the President by his party and requesting favorable action on the extension and strengthening of the National Recovery Act and the further definition and revision of the labor provisions of that act, the abolition of utility holding companies, the enactment of needed revision of the Federal Reserve Act, and transportation legislation; to the Committee on Labor.

8293. By Mr. COSTELLO: Resolution of Arizona State Chamber of Commerce, urging continuance of present excise tax on copper; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE

TUESDAY, MAY 7, 1935

The Chaplain, Rev. Z. Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father of mercies, whose never-failing love alone can heal our wounds, be with us now; be very near, dear Lord, in this sad hour wherein we pause in loving tribute to the memory of him our friend, so late our gallant comrade. Vouchsafe him peace and joy in the paradise of God, and may he go from strength to strength in that life of perfect service. Deal tenderly with her whose love hath ever been to him the earnest of Thy love, that through the shadows of the valley Thy staff may be her stay, Thine everlasting arms her sure refuge. Grant unto us who are still in our pilgrimage that purity of intention which sets the seal of a supernatural distinction upon the humblest life; gird us with prudence and restraint, the holy armour of knights dedicated to a divine adventure, in which discretion shall reveal itself as the high wisdom of that love which cares not for the dangers of the way but only for the face of the Beloved.

When on my day of life the night is falling
And, in the winds from unseen spaces blown,
I hear far voices out of darkness calling
My feet to paths unknown.

Thou, who hast made my house of life so pleasant,
 Leave not its tenant, when its walls decay;
 O Love Divine, O Helper ever present,
 Be Thou my strength and stay.

I have but Thee, my Father, let Thy Spirit
 Be with me then, to comfort and uphold;
 No gate of pearl, no branch of palm I merit,
 No street of shining gold.

Suffice it if, my good and ill unreckoned,
 And both forgiven through Thy abounding grace,
 I find myself by hands familiar beckoned
 Unto my fitting place.

Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Friday, May 3, and of Monday, May 6, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On April 29, 1935:

S. 1209. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to relinquish the easement for a water main at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii; and

S. 1610. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept on behalf of the United States a certain strip of land from the State of South Carolina.

On May 3, 1935:

S. 408. An act to promote safety on the public highways of the District of Columbia by providing for the financial responsibility of owners and operators of motor vehicles for damages caused by motor vehicles on the public highways in the District of Columbia; to prescribe penalties for the violation of the provisions of this act; and for other purposes.

On May 6, 1935:

S. 2035. An act to amend an act approved June 25, 1934, authorizing loans from the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, for the construction of certain municipal buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

ORDER FOR CONSIDERATION OF UNFINISHED BUSINESS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of morning business the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DECISION OF SUPREME COURT IN RAILWAY EMPLOYEES RETIREMENT CASE (S. DOC. NO. 55)

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, yesterday the Supreme Court handed down an opinion declaring unconstitutional the Railroad Retirement Act passed by Congress last June. It is always a serious matter when an act of Congress is thus voided, especially when the question is of great social import and is resolved by a 5-to-4 decision. Of course, the word of the Court is the law, and as such is entitled to respect and obedience. But the United States Senate has never regarded it improper to inspect and comment upon the intrinsic validity of the decisions of the Supreme Court, whether they are consonant with a living law responsive to social needs, and whether they are forced upon the Court by the weight of existing precedent. I am sure there are some Members of the Senate, familiar with the divisions of the Court in other cases of great social significance, who will at the outset be inclined to agree with the reasoning of Chief Justice Hughes and Justices Brandeis, Stone, and Cardozo, the dissenters in this pension case, rather than with the majority opinion of Justice Roberts, concurred in by Justices Van Devanter, McReynolds, Sutherland, and Butler. And I am sure that this inclination will be confirmed by careful reading of the powerful opinion of the Chief Justice. I venture the prophecy that before many years shall pass this dissenting view will be the law of the land. Let me merely recall to the Senate that when by a 5-to-4 vote the Supreme Court in 1922 struck down the minimum-wage law for women in the District of Columbia, thus provoking the criticism from the Senate and the country, Mr. Justices Van Devanter, McReynolds, Sutherland, and Butler were in the majority.

Obviously the several States could not pass compulsory retirement-pension legislation covering railway employees in interstate commerce. From the practical point of view interstate transportation is too independent of State lines and too national in character to justify other than national regulation. This fact has long been recognized by Congress and by the Supreme Court in a long history of legislation dealing with the subject of railway employees.

Thus if the majority opinion means that the Federal Government cannot act in any way to set up safeguards to protect the superannuated railway worker, it means that we are as a nation powerless to accomplish this end. I cannot believe that our Constitution or the majority of the present Court intend such an impasse.

As I read the majority opinion, it holds merely that under the interstate-commerce clause Congress has not the power to provide pensions for railway employees, the theory being that the retirement of superannuated workers has no effect upon the efficiency and flow of interstate commerce.

My own view is in accord with the finding of fact by Congress as expressed in its declaration of policy—namely, that retiring the superannuated worker, besides serving a significant social purpose, affects the efficiency and flow of interstate commerce.

But there is another theory upon which such legislation can be sustained. That is the theory embraced in the pending economic-security bill, which might well be amended to include railway employees. The pension plan under that bill does not rest upon the commerce power at all but upon the power of the Federal Government to tax for a public purpose and to expend money for the general welfare. The Court has never indicated that a tax for old-age pensions does not fall within the category of a public purpose; in fact, cases involving State systems have held the contrary. And no substantial limitations have ever been placed upon the spending power of Congress. Thus it seems clear that the old-age-pension plan contemplated by the economic-security bill is constitutional. Certainly no showing can be made that it is affected in any way by the recent decision of the Court. And the unemployment-insurance features of the economic-security bill, which are based upon Federal subsidies, are clearly in line with past acts of Congress that have not been subjected to challenge.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the prevailing and dissenting opinions of the Court in the so-called "retirement-pension case" be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will not the Senator also ask that the majority and minority opinions be printed as a Senate document?

Mr. WAGNER. I accept the suggestion of the senior Senator from Florida, and also ask that the prevailing and dissenting opinions be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The prevailing and dissenting opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case referred to are as follows:

[Supreme Court of the United States. No. 566. October term, 1934. Railroad Retirement Board et al., petitioners, v. The Alton Railroad Co. et al. On writ of certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.]

[May 6, 1935]

Mr. Justice Roberts delivered the opinion of the Court.

The respondents, comprising 134 class I railroads, 2 express companies, and the Pullman Co., brought this suit in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, asserting the unconstitutionality of the Railroad Retirement Act¹ and praying an injunction against its enforcement. From a decree granting the relief sought an appeal was perfected to the Court of Appeals. Before hearing in that tribunal the petitioners applied for a writ of certiorari, representing that no serious or difficult questions of fact were involved, and urging the importance of an early and final decision of the controversy. In the exercise of power conferred by statute² we issued the writ.³

The act establishes a compulsory retirement and pension system for all carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act. There is provision for the creation of a fund to be deposited in the United States Treasury (secs. 5, 8) and administered by a Board denominated an independent agency in the executive branch of the Government (sec. 9). The retirement fund for payment of these pensions and for the expenses of administration of the system will arise from compulsory contribution from present and future employees and the carriers. The sums payable by the employees are to be percentages of their current compensation, and those by each carrier double the total payment by its employees. The Board is to determine from time to time what percentage is required to provide the necessary funds, but until that body otherwise determines the employee contribution is to be 2 percent of compensation (sec. 5). Out of this fund annuities are to be paid to beneficiaries.

The classes of persons eligible for such annuities are (1) employees of any carrier on the date of passage of the act; (2) those who subsequently become employees of any carrier; (3) those who within 1 year prior to the date of enactment were in the service of any carrier (sec. 1b).

To every person in any of the three categories an annuity becomes payable: (a) When he reaches the age of 65 years, whether then in carrier service or not (sec. 3); if still in such service he and his employer may agree that he shall remain for successive periods of 1 year until he attains 70, at which time he must retire (sec. 4); (b) at the option of the employee, at any time between the ages of 51 and 65, if he has served a total of 30 years in the employ of one or more carriers, whether continuously or not (secs. 3, 1f). The compulsory-retirement provision is not applicable to those in official positions until 5 years after the effective date of the act (sec. 4).

The annuity is payable monthly (sec. 1d). The amount is ascertained by multiplying the number of years of service, not exceeding 30, before as well as subsequent to the date the act was adopted, whether for a single carrier or a number of carriers, and whether continuous or not, by graduated percentages of the employees' average monthly compensation (excluding all over $300). If one who has completed 30 years of service elects to retire before attaining the age of 65 years, the annuity is reduced by one-fifteenth for each year he lacks of that age, unless the retirement is due to physical or mental disability (sec. 3).

Upon the death of an employee, before or after retirement, his estate is to be repaid all that he has contributed to the fund, with 3-percent interest compounded annually, less any annuity payments received by him (sec. 3).

The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia declared the establishment of such a system within the competence of Congress; but thought several inseparable features of the act transcended the legislative power to regulate interstate commerce, and required a holding that the law is unconstitutional in its entirety. Our duty, like that of the court below, is fairly to construe the powers of Congress, and to ascertain whether or not the enactment falls within them, uninfluenced by predilection for or against the policy disclosed in the legislation. The fact that the compulsory scheme is novel is, of course, no evidence of unconstitutionality. Even should we consider the act unwise and prejudicial to both public and private interest, if it be fairly within delegated power our obligation is to sustain it. On the other hand though we should think the measure embodies a valuable social plan and be in entire sympathy with its purpose and intended results, if the provisions go beyond the boundaries of constitutional power we must so declare.

The admitted fact that many railroads have voluntarily adopted pension plans does not aid materially in determining the authority of Congress to compel conformance to the one embodied in the Railroad Retirement Act; nor does the establishment of compulsory retirement plans in European countries, to which petitioners refer, for in many of these railroads are operated under government ownership, and none has a constitutional system comparable to ours.

The Federal Government is one of enumerated powers; those not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people. The Constitution is not a statute, but the supreme law of the land to which all statutes must conform, and the powers conferred upon the Federal Government are to be reasonably and fairly construed, with a view to effectuating their purposes. But recognition of this principle cannot justify attempted exercise of a power clearly beyond the true purpose of the grant. All agree that the pertinent provision of the Constitution is article I, section 8, clause 3, which confers power on the Congress "To regulate commerce . . . among the several States . . ."; and that this power must be exercised in subjection to the guarantee of due process of law found in the fifth amendment.⁴

The petitioners assert that the questioned act, fairly considered, is a proper and necessary regulation of interstate commerce; its various provisions have reasonable relation to the main and controlling purposes of the enactment, the promotion of efficiency, economy and safety; consequently it falls within the power conferred by the commerce clause and does not offend the principle of due process. The respondents insist that numerous features of the contravene the due-process guaranty and further that the requirement of pensions for employees of railroads is not a regulation of interstate commerce within the meaning of the Constitution. These conflicting views open two fields of inquiry which to some extent overlap.⁵ If we assume that under the power to regulate commerce between the States Congress may require the carriers to make some provision for retiring and pensioning their employees, then the contention that various provisions of the act are arbitrary and unreasonable and bear no proper relation to that end must be considered. If any are found which deprive the railroads of their property without due process, we must determine whether the remainder may nevertheless stand. Broadly the record presents the question whether a statutory requirement that retired employees shall be paid pensions is regulation of commerce between the States within article I, section 8.

1. We first consider the provisions affecting former employees. The act makes eligible for pensions all who were in carrier service within 1 year prior to its passage, irrespective of any future reemployment. About 146,000 persons fall within this class, which, as found below, includes those who have been discharged for cause, who have been retired, who have resigned to take other gainful employment, who have been discharged because their positions were abolished, who were temporarily employed, or who left the service for other reasons. These persons were not in carrier service at the date of the act, and it is certain thousands of them never again will be. The petitioners say the provision was inserted to assure those on furlough or temporarily relieved from duty subject to call the benefit of past years of service in the event of reemployment, and to prevent the carriers from escaping their just obligations by omitting to recall these persons to service. And it is said that to attempt nicely to adjust the provisions of the act to furloughed men would involve difficulties of interpretation and inequalities of operation which the blanket provision avoids. We cannot accept this view. It is arbitrary in the last degree to place upon the carriers the burden of gratuities to thousands who have been unfaithful and for that cause have been separated from the service, or who have elected to pursue some other calling, or who have retired from the business, or have been for other reasons lawfully dismissed. And the claim that such largess will promote efficiency or safety in the future operation of the railroads is without support in reason or common sense.

In addition to the 146,000 who left the service during the year preceding the passage of the act, over 1,000,000 persons have been but are not now in the employ of the carriers. The statute provides that if any of them is reemployed at any time, for any period, however brief, and in any capacity, his prior service with any carrier shall be reckoned in computing the annuity payable upon his attaining 65 years of age. Such a person may have been out of railroad work for years; his employment may have been terminated for cause; he may have elected to enter some other industry and may have devoted the best years of his life to it; yet if, perchance, some carrier in a distant part of the country should accept him for work of any description, even temporarily, the act throws the burden of his pension on all the railroads, including, it may be, the very one which for just cause dismissed him. Plainly this requirement alters contractual rights; plainly it imposes for the future a burden never contemplated by either party when the earlier relation existed or when it was terminated. The statute would take from the railroads' future earnings amounts to be paid for services fully compensated when rendered in accordance with contract, with no thought on the part of either employer or employee that further sums must be provided by the carrier. The provision is not only retroactive in that it resurrects for new burdens transactions long since past and closed; but as to some of the railroad companies it constitutes a naked appropriation of private property upon the basis of transactions with which the owners of the property were never connected. Thus the act denies due process of law by taking the property of one and bestowing it upon another. This onerous financial burden cannot be justified upon the plea that it is in the interest of economy, or will promote efficiency or safety. The petitioners say that one who is taken back into service will no doubt render more loyal service since he will know he is to receive a bonus for earlier work. But he will not attribute this benefaction to his employer. The argument comes merely to the contentment and satisfaction theory discussed elsewhere. The petitioners also argue that if the provision in question threatens an unreasonable burden, the carriers have in their own control the means of avoidance, since no carrier need employ any person who has heretofore been in the railroad business. The position is untenable for several reasons. A carrier may wish to employ one having experience, who has been in another's service. Must it forego the opportunity because to choose the servant will impose a financial obligation arising out of an earlier employment with some other railroad? Would that promote efficiency and safety? The testimony shows that 22 percent of all railway employees have had prior service on some railroad. Must a carrier at its peril exercise, through dozens of employment agencies scattered over a vast territory, an unheard-of degree of care to exclude all former railroad workers at the risk of incurring the penalty of paying a pension for work long since performed for some other employer? So to hold would be highly unreasonable and arbitrary.

2. Several features of the act, touching those now or hereafter in railroad employment, are especially challenged by the respondents.

No specified length of service is required for eligibility to pension, though the amount of the annuity is proportionately reduced if the total term of employment be less than 30 years. One may take a position with a carrier at 20, remain until he is 30, resign after gaining valuable skill and aptitude for his work enter a more lucrative profession, and, though never thereafter in carrier employ, at 65 receive a pension calculated on his 10 years of service. Or after 10 years he may be discharged for peculation, and still be entitled to the gratuity. Or he may be relieved of duty for gross negligence, entailing loss of life or property, and yet collect his pension at 65. May these results be fairly denominated the indicia of reasonable regulation of commerce? May they be cited in favor of this pension system as an aid to economy, efficiency, or safety? We cannot so hold. The petitioners' explanation of this feature of the act is that no "real assurance" of "old-age security" is possible "when pension rights may be lost at any time by loss of employment"; that such a provision is reasonable "because it improves the morale of the employees while they are in the service." Assurance of security it truly gives, but, quite as truly, if "morale" is intended to connote efficiency, loyalty and continuity of service, the surest way to destroy it in any privately owned business is to substitute legislative largess for private bounty and thus transfer the drive for pensions to the halls of Congress and transmute loyalty to employer into gratitude to the legislature.

The act assumes that, in fairness, both employer and employee should contribute in fixed proportions to a liberal pension. But we find that in contradiction of this recognized principle, thousands of those in the service at the date of the act will at once become entitled to annuities, though they will have contributed nothing to the fund. The burden thus cast on the carriers is found to be for the first year of administration over $9,000,000, and until the termination of payments to these annuitants not less than $78,000,000. All that has been said of the irrelevance of the requirement of payments based upon services heretofore terminated to any consideration of efficiency or safety applies here with equal force. The petitioners say that the retention of these men will be injurious and costly to the service. This view assumes they will be retained for years and are incompetent to do what they are now doing. Evidence is lacking to support either supposition. Next it is said "that they will receive from the fund more than they will have contributed is not significant for all retired employees receive more than they contribute." This attempted but futile justification is significant of the fault in the feature sought to be supported.

One who has served a total of 30 years is entitled to retire on pension, at his election, at whatever his then attained age. Thus, many who are experienced and reliable may, at their own election, deprive a carrier of their services, enter another gainful occupation, cease to contribute to the fund, and go upon the pension roll years before the fixed retirement age of 65. The finding is that there are not less than 100,000 in the service of the carriers between 51 and 65 years of age who have had 30 or more years of service. The option is not extended to them to retire on pension in order to improve transportation, for the choice is the employee's, to be exercised solely on grounds personal to himself; and the provisions cannot promote economy, for the retiring worker's place will be filled by another who will receive the same wage. The court below properly found that "it is to the interest of the service of plaintiffs and is to the interest of the public that those of such employees who are competent and efficient be retained in carrier service for the benefit of their skill and experience." The petitioners say "clearly the provision in question is not arbitrary and unreasonable so as to be unlawful"; but in support of this statement they adduce only the following considerations: As the pension is reduced one-fifteenth for each year the annuitant lacks of 65 at the date of retirement, his separation, it is said, will impose no greater burden on the fund than if he had waited until 65; the reduction in the amount payable will discourage early retirement, and so tend to counteract the loss of skilled workers; and, finally, "the justification for this provision is that employees who have completed 30 years of service may find it necessary, and it may be in the interest of the industry, for them to retire before age 65." We search in vain for any assertion that the feature under discussion will promote economy, efficiency, or safety, and the absence of any such claim is not surprising. The best that can be said, it seems, is that the burden incident to the privilege of early retirement will not be as heavy as others imposed by the statute.

On June 27, 1934, when the act was approved, there were 1,164,707 people in carrier employ. The act, by conferring a statutory right to a pension, based in part on past service, gave the work theretofore performed by these persons a new quality. Although completed and compensated in full in conformity with the agreement of the parties that work done over a period of 30 years past is to be the basis for further compulsory payment. While, as petitioners point out, the bounties are payable only in the future, any continuance of the relations, however brief, subsequent to the passage of the act matures a right which reaches back to the date of original employment. And to the amount payable in virtue of all these prior years' service the employees contribute nothing. It is no answer to say that from the effective date of the law they will have to contribute from their wages half as much as do their employers. The future accrues its own annuities. The finding accepted by the petitioners as veracious is that the annuities payable for service performed prior to June 27, 1934, would in the year 1935 amount to $68,749,000, and would increase yearly until 1953, in which year the portion of the aggregate pension payments attributable to work antedating the passage of the act would be $137,435,000. These figures apply only to pensions to those now employed and exclude payments to those who left the service during the year prior to the adoption of the act and to those former employees who may hereafter be reemployed.

This clearly arbitrary imposition of liability to pay again for services long since rendered and fully compensated is not permissible legislation. The court below held the provision deprived the railroads of their property without due process, and we agree with that conclusion. Here again the petitioners insist that the requirement is appropriate because, they say, it does not demand additional pay for past services but expenditure "for a present and future benefit through improvement of the personnel of the carriers." But the argument ends with mere statement. Moreover, if it were correct in its assumption, which we shall presently show it is not, nevertheless there can be no constitutional justification for arbitrarily imposing millions of dollars of additional liabilities upon the carriers in respect of transactions long closed on a basis of cost with reference to which their rates were made and their fiscal affairs adjusted.

The act defines as an employee entitled to its benefits an official or representative of an employee organization who, during or following employment by a carrier, acts for such an organization in behalf of employees. Such an one may retire and receive a pension provided in future he pays an amount equal to the sum of the contributions of an employee and of an employer. The petitioners say the burden thus imposed is not great; but the provision exhibits the same arbitrary and unreasonable features as those heretofore discussed, and seems irrelevant to any enhancement of safety or efficiency in transportation.

3. Certain general features of the system violate the fifth amendment. Under the statutory plan the draft upon the pension fund will be at a given rate, while the contributions of individual carriers to build up the fund will be at a disparate rate. This results from the underlying theory of the act, which is that all the railroads shall be treated as a single employer. The report of the Senate subcommittee announced.

"It is agreed that all railroads which have been subjected to the jurisdiction of Congress are to be treated together as one employer. All persons in the service of the railroads are to be regarded as employees of the one employer. * * * The old-age pension or annuity is to be based upon the wages and the length of service upon all railroads, with specified maximum limits."

The petitioners themselves showed at the trial that the probable age of entry into service of typical carriers differs materially; for one it is 28.4, for another 32.4, for a third 29.3, and for a fourth 34.2. Naturally the age of a pensioner at date of employment will affect the resultant burden upon the contributors to the fund. The statute requires that all employees of age 70 must retire immediately. It is found that 56 of the respondents have no employees in that class. Nevertheless they must contribute toward the pensions of such employees of other respondents nearly $4,000,000 the first year and nearly $33,000,000 in the total. The petitioners admit that these are the facts, but attempt to avoid their force by the assertion that "the cost differentials which are involved are negligible as compared with the total cost." This can only mean that in view of the enormous total cost to all the railroads, the group thus discriminated against should not complain of the disregard of their ownership of their own assets, because in comparison with gross cost the additional payments due to the inequality mentioned are small.

The evidence shows that some respondents are solvent and others not, a situation which often may recur. The petitioners concede that the plan is intended to furnish assurance of payment of pensions to employees of all the carriers, with the result that solvent railroads must furnish the money necessary to meet the demands of the system upon insolvent carriers, since the very purpose of the act is that the pension fund itself shall be kept solvent and able to answer all the obligations placed upon it.

In recent years many carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act have gone out of existence. The petitioners admit that the employees of these defunct carriers are treated upon exactly the same basis as the servants of existing carriers. In other words, past service for a carrier no longer existing is to be added to any service hereafter rendered to an operating carrier, in computing a pension the whole burden of payment of which falls on those carriers still functioning. And all the future employees of any railroad which discontinues operation must be paid their pensions by the surviving roads. Again the answer of the petitioners is that the amount will be negligible. The fact that millions of dollars are involved in other features of the act will not serve to obscure this violation of due process.

All the carriers must make good the contributions of all employees, for section 3 directs that upon the death of an employee the board shall pay him from the fund what he has contributed to it with 3 percent interest compounded annually, less any payments he has received. The railroads are not only liable for their own contributions but are, in a measure, made insurers of those of the employees. This appears to be an unnecessarily harsh and arbitrary imposition, if the plan is to be what on its face it imports, a joint adventure with mutuality of obligation and benefit.

This Court has repeatedly had occasion to say that the railroads, though their property be dedicated to the public use, remain the private property of their owners, and that their assets may not be taken without just compensation.¹ The carriers have not ceased to be privately operated and privately owned, however much subject to regulation in the interest of interstate commerce. There is no warrant for taking the property or money of one and transferring it to another without compensation, whether the object of the transfer be to build up the equipment of the transferee or to pension its employees.

The petitioners insist that since the adoption of the Transportation Act, 1920, and as the logical consequence of decisions of this court, we must recognize that Congress may deal with railroad transportation as a whole and regulate the carriers generally and in classes, with an eye to improvement and development of railway service as a whole; that the interstate carriers use common facilities, make through rates, and interact amongst themselves in various ways, with the result that where any link in the chain lacks efficiency the system as a whole is affected. The argument is that since the railroads and the public have a common interest in the efficient performance of the whole transportation chain, it is proper and necessary to require all carriers to contribute to the cost of a plan designed to serve this end. It is said that the pooling principle is desirable because there are many small carriers whose employees are too few to justify maintenance of a separate retirement plan for each. And, finally, the claim is that in fixing carrier contributions, any attempt to give consideration to difference in age, classification, and service periods of employees would involve grave administrative difficulties and unduly increase the cost of administration. With these considerations in view the petitioners urge that our decisions sanction the exercise of the power involved in the pooling feature of the statute. They rely upon the New England Divisions case (261 U. S. 184). That case, however, dealt purely with rates; and while the policy of awarding a larger share of the division of a joint rate to the weaker carrier, in consideration of its need for revenue, was approved, the approval was definitely conditioned upon the circumstance that the share or division of the joint rate awarded to the stronger carrier was not so low as to require it to serve for an unreasonable rate. Thus the principle that Congress has no power to confiscate the property of one carrier for the benefit of another was fully recognized.

Dayton-Goose Creek Ry. Co. v. United States (263 U. S. 456) approved the provision of the Transportation Act, 1920, which required the carriers to contribute "one-half of their excess earnings" to a revolving fund to be used by the Interstate Commerce Commission for making loans to carriers to meet capital expenditures and to refund maturing obligations, or to purchase equipment and facilities which might be leased to carriers. This case is relied upon as sustaining the principle underlying the pension act, but we think improperly. The provision was sustained upon the ground that it must be so administered as to leave to each carrier a reasonable return upon its property devoted to transportation, and the holding is clear that if this principle were not observed in administration, the act would invade constitutional rights.

Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co. v. Riverside Mills (219 U. S. 186), which the petitioners cite, is even wider of the mark. There this Court upheld the Carmack amendment, which made the initial carrier liable to the consignor for loss of goods contracted to be delivered over connecting lines. The legislation merely attached certain consequences to a given form of contract. It was recognized that initial carriers in fact enter into contracts for delivery of goods beyond their own lines and make through or joint rates over independent lines. This being so, it was held a proper exercise of the power of regulation to require one so contracting to be liable in the first instance to the shipper. So to regulate a recognized form of contract is not offensive to the fifth amendment.

It is claimed that several other decisions confirm the legality of the pooling principle, when reasonably applied. For this position petitioners cite Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington (243 U. S. 219); Noble State Bank v. Haskell (219 U. S. 104), and Thornton v. Duffy (254 U. S. 361). In the first of these the Washington workmen's compensation act, which required employers in extrahazardous employment to pay into a State fund certain premiums based upon the percentage of estimated pay roll of the workmen employed, was under attack. For the purpose of payments into the fund accounts were to be kept with each industry in accordance with a statutory classification, and it was definitely provided that no class should be liable for the depletion of the accident fund by reason of accidents happening in any other class. The act, therefore, clearly recognized the difference in drain or burden on the fund arising from different industries and sought to equate the burden in accordance with the risk. The challenge of the employers was that the statute failed of equitable apportionment as between the constituted classes. But no proof was furnished to that effect, and this court assumed that the classification was made in an effort at fairness and equity as between classes. The Railroad Retirement Act, on the contrary, makes no classification, but, as above said, treats all the carriers as a single employer, irrespective of their several conditions.

In the second case this Court upheld a statute which required State banks to contribute a uniform percentage of their deposits to a State guaranty fund established for the purpose of making good losses to the depositors of banks which might become insolvent. The act was sustained upon the principle that an ulterior public advantage may justify the taking of a comparatively insignificant amount of private property for what in its immediate purpose is a private use. It was further said that there may be cases other than those of taxation in which the share of each party in the benefit of a scheme of mutual protection is sufficient compensation for the correlative burden which it is compelled to assume. These considerations clearly distinguish that case from the one now under discussion.

In the case last cited it was asserted that the workmen's compensation act of Ohio unfairly discriminated because it allowed employers in certain cases to pay directly to workmen or their dependents the compensation provided by law, in lieu of contributing to the State fund established to secure such payments. This Court held that the classification did not amount to a denial of due process.

We conclude that the provisions of the act which disregard the private and separate ownership of the several respondents, treat them all as a single employer, and pool all their assets regardless of their individual obligations and the varying conditions found in their respective enterprises, cannot be justified as consistent with due process.

The act is said to be unconstitutional because unreasonably and unconscionably burdensome and oppressive upon the respondents, and we are referred to a finding of the court below to which petitioners do not assign error. The facts as found are: based upon present pay rolls, the carriers' contributions for the first year will aggregate not less than $60,000,000; at the rates fixed in the act, total employee and carrier contributions will, on the basis of present pay rolls, be approximately $90,000,000 per year; unless the amount of the contributions is increased by the Board, the drain on the fund for payment of pensions will result in a deficit of over $11,000,000 by the year 1942. To keep the fund in operation it will be necessary for the Board to increase the percentages of contributions named in the act. The petitioners' actuary testified that in the tenth year of operation the payments from the fund will be upwards of $137,000,000. The railroads' total contribution to pensions on account of prior service of employees in service at the date of the act may amount to $2,943,966,000. We are not prepared to hold that if the law were in other respects within the legislative competence, the enormous cost involved in its administration would invalidate it; but the recited facts at least emphasize the burdensome and perhaps destructive effect of the contraventions of the due process of law clause which we find exist. Moreover they exhibit the inconsistency of the petitioners' position that the law is necessary because in times of depression the voluntary systems of the carriers are threatened by loss of revenue. It is difficult to perceive how the vast increase in pension expense entailed by the statute will, without provision of additional revenue, relieve the difficulty experienced by some railroads in meeting the demands of the plans now in force.

4. What has been said sufficiently indicates our agreement with the holding of the trial court respecting the disregard of due process exhibited by a number of the provisions of the act. We also concur in that court's views concerning the inseparability of certain of them. The statute contains a section broadly declaring the intent that invalid provisions shall not operate to destroy the law as a whole.² Such a declaration provides a rule which may aid in determining the legislative intent, but is not an inexorable command (Dorcy v. Kansas, 264 U. S. 286). It has the effect of reversing the presumption which would otherwise be indulged, of an intent that unless the act operates as an entirety it shall be wholly ineffective (Williams v. Standard Oil Co., 278 U. S. 235, 242; Utah Power & Light Co. v. Pjost, 286 U. S. 165, 184). But notwithstanding the presumption in favor of divisibility which arises from the legislative declaration, we cannot rewrite a statute and give it an effect altogether different from that sought by the measure viewed as a whole. Compare Hill v. Wallace (259 U. S. 44, 70). In this view we are confirmed by the petitioners' argument that as to some of the features we hold unenforceable, it is "unthinkable" and "impossible" that the Congress would have created the compulsory pension system without them. They so affect the dominant aim of the whole statute as to carry it down with them.

5. It results from what has now been said that the act is invalid because several of its inseparable provisions contravene the due process of law clause of the fifth amendment. We are of opinion that it is also bad for another reason which goes to the heart of the law, even if it could survive the loss of the unconstitutional features which we have discussed. The act is not in purpose or effect a regulation of interstate commerce within the meaning of the Constitution.

² SEC. 14. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of the act or application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Several purposes are expressed in section 2 (a), amongst them: To provide "adequately for the satisfactory retirement of aged employees"; "to make possible greater employment opportunity and more rapid advancement"; to provide by the administration and construction of the act "the greatest practicable amount of relief from unemployment and the greatest possible use of resources available for said purpose and for the payment of annuities for the relief of superannuated employees." The respondents assert and the petitioners admit that though these may in and of themselves be laudable objects, they have no reasonable relation to the business of interstate transportation. The clause, however, states a further purpose, the promotion of "efficiency and safety in interstate transportation", and the respondents concede that an act, the provisions of which show that it actually is directed to the attainment of such a purpose, falls within the regulatory power conferred upon the Congress; but they contend that here the provisions of the statute emphasize the necessary conclusion that the plan is conceived solely for the promotion of the stated purposes other than efficient and safe operation of the railroads. The petitioners' view is that this is the true and only purpose of the enactment, and the other objects stated are collateral to it and may be disregarded if the law is found apt for the promotion of this legitimate purpose.

From what has already been said with respect to sundry features of the statutory scheme, it must be evident that petitioners' view is that safety and efficiency are promoted by two claimed results of the plan: The abolition of excessive superannuation and the improvement of morale.

The parties are at odds respecting the existing superannuation of railway employees. Petitioners say it is much greater than that found in the heavy industries. Respondents assert it is less, and the court below so found. The finding is challenged as being contrary to the evidence. We may, for present purposes, assume that "superannuation" as petitioners use the term, i. e., the attainment of 65 years, is as great or greater in the railroad industry than in comparable employments. It does not follow, as contended, that the man of that age is inefficient or incompetent. The facts indicate a contrary conclusion. Petitioners say the seniority rules and the laying off of younger men first in reducing forces necessarily tend to keep an undue proportion of older men in the service. They say this tendency has long been marked in the railroad industry and has been most noticeable in recent years of depression when forces have been greatly reduced. But what are the uncontradicted facts as to efficiency and safety of operation? Incontrovertible statistics obtained from the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission show a steady increase in safety of operation during this period of alleged increasing superannuation.⁹ Indeed, one of the petitioners, and one of their most important witnesses, has written, referring to railroads:

"Experience seems to have proved, moreover, that older workers cause fewer accidents than do younger; hence there is little necessity for removing them on that ground."¹⁰

There is overwhelming evidence in the record to the same effect. All that petitioners offer on the subject in their brief is, "In an industry having as many hazardous occupations as the railway industry, improvement in personnel conditions is likely to mean increased safety." We think it not unfair to say that the claim for promotion of safety is virtually abandoned.

How stands the case for efficiency? Here again the record without contradiction demonstrates that in step with the alleged progressive superannuation on the railroads their operations have increased in efficiency.¹¹ The trial court found, and its finding is not assigned as error: "Railroads were, when the act was enacted, and are now, operated efficiently and safely and more efficiently and much more safely than at any time in history."

Lastly, the petitioners suggest that diminution of superannuation promotes economy, because younger and lower paid men will replace the retired older men. But the argument is based upon inadvertent disregard of the wage structure of the carriers, especially in the train and engine service, whereby contract compensation is based not on age but upon the nature of the duties performed. The replacement of one by another who is to do the same work will therefore beget no saving in wages.

When to these considerations is added that, as heretofore said, the act disregards fitness to work, pensions the worker who retires at his option before any suggested superannuation, irrespective of skill or ability, pensions those who are presently compelled by the law to retire, irrespective of their fitness to labor, and grants annuities to those who are discharged for dishonesty or gross carelessness, it becomes perfectly clear that, though the plan may bring about the social benefits mentioned in section 2 (a), it has and can have no relation to the promotion of efficiency, economy, or safety by separating the unfit from the industry. If these ends demand the elimination of aged employees, their retirement from the service would suffice to accomplish the object. For these purposes, the prescription of a pension for those dropped from service is wholly irrelevant. The petitioners, conscious of the truth of this statement, endeavor to avoid its force by the argument that social and humanitarian considerations demand the support of the retired employee. They assert that it would be unthinkable to retire a man without pension, and add that attempted separation of retirement and pensions is unreal in any practical sense, since it would be impossible to require carriers to cast old workers aside without means of support. The supposed impossibility arises from a failure to distinguish constitutional power from social desirability. The relation of retirement to safety and efficiency is distinct from the relation of a pension to the same ends, and the two relationships are not to be confused.

In the final analysis, the petitioners' sole reliance is the thesis that efficiency depends upon morale and morale, in turn, upon assurance of security for the worker's old age. Thus, pensions are sought to be related to efficiency of transportation and brought within the commerce power. In supporting the act the petitioners constantly recur to such phrases as "old-age security", "assurance of old-age security", "improvement of employee morale and efficiency through providing definite assurance of old-age security", "assurance of old-age support", "mind at ease", and "fear of old-age dependency." These expressions are frequently connected with assertions that the removal of the fear of old-age dependency will tend to create a better morale throughout the ranks of employees. The theory is that one who has an assurance against future dependency will do his work more cheerfully and therefore more efficiently. The question at once presents itself whether the fostering of a contented mind on the part of an employee by legislation of this type is in any just sense a regulation of interstate transportation. If that question be answered in the affirmative, obviously there is no limit to the field of so-called "regulation." The catalog of means and actions which might be imposed upon an employer in any business tending to the satisfaction and comfort of his employees seems endless. Provision for free medical attendance and nursing, for clothing, for food, for housing, for the education of children, and a hundred other matters might with equal propriety be proposed as tending to relieve the employee of mental strain and worry. Can it fairly be said that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce extends to the prescription of any or all of these things? Is it not apparent that they are really and essentially related solely to the social welfare of the worker and, therefore, remote from any regulation of commerce as such? We think the answer is plain. These matters obviously lie outside the orbit of congressional power. The answer of the petitioners is that not all such means of promoting contentment have such a close relation to interstate commerce as pensions. This is, in truth, no answer; for we must deal with the principle involved and not the means adopted. If contentment of the employee were an object for the attainment of which the regulatory power could be exerted, the courts could not question the wisdom of methods adopted for its advancement.

No support for a plan which pensions those who have retired from the service of the railroads can be drawn from the decisions of this Court sustaining measures touching the relations of employer and employee in the carrier field in the interest of a more efficient system of transportation. The safety appliance acts, the employers' liability acts, hours-of-service laws, and others of analogous character, cited in support of this act, have a direct and intimate connection with the actual operation of the railroads. No less inapposite are the statutes which deal with exchange of facilities, joint facilities, joint rates, etc. For these have an obvious and direct bearing on the obligations of public service incident to the calling of the railroads. The Railway Labor Act was upheld by this Court upon the express ground that to facilitate the amicable settlement of disputes which threatened the service of the necessary agencies of interstate transportation tended to prevent interruptions of service and was therefore within the delegated power of regulation. It was pointed out that the act did not interfere with the normal right of the carrier to select its employees or discharge them (Texas & New Orleans R. R. Co. v. Railway Clerks, 281 U. S. 548, 570-571). The legislation considered in Wilson v. New (243 U. S. 332) was drafted to meet a particular exigency, and its validity depended upon circumstances so unusual that this Court's decision respecting it cannot be considered a precedent here.

Stress is laid upon the supposed analogy between workmen's compensation laws and the challenged statute. It is said that while Congress has not adopted a compulsory and exclusive system of workmen's compensation applicable to interstate carriers no one doubts the power so to do; and the Retirement Act cannot in principle be distinguished. The contention overlooks fundamental differences. Every carrier owes to its employees certain duties the disregard of which renders it liable at common law in an action sounding in tort. Each State has developed or adopted as part of its jurisprudence rules as to the employer's liability in particular circumstances. These are not the same in all the States. In the absence of a rule applicable to all engaged in interstate transportation the right of recovery for injury or death of an employee may vary depending upon the applicable State law. That Congress may under the commerce power prescribe a uniform rule of liability, and a remedy uniformly available to all those so engaged is not open to doubt. The considerations upon which we have sustained compulsory workmen's compensation laws passed by the States in the sphere where their jurisdiction is exclusive apply with equal force in any sphere wherein Congress has been granted paramount authority. Such authority it may assert whenever its exercise is appropriate to the purpose of the grant. A case in point is the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act passed pursuant to the delegation of admiralty jurisdiction to the United States. Modern industry and this is particularly true of railroads involves instrumentalities, tasks, and dangers unknown when the doctrines of the common law as to negligence were developing. The resultant injuries to employees, impossible of prevention by the utmost care, may well demand new and different redress than that afforded in the past. In dealing with the situation it is permissible to substitute a new remedy for the common-law right of action; to deprive the employer of common-law defenses and substitute a fixed and reasonable compensation commuted to the degree of injury; to replace uncertainty and protracted litigation with certainty and celerity of payment; to eliminate waste; and to make the rule of compensation uniform throughout the field of interstate transportation, in contrast with inconsistent local systems. By the very certainty that compensation must be paid for every injury such legislation promotes and encourages precaution on the part of the employer against accident and tends to make transportation safer and more efficient. The power to prescribe a uniform rule for the transportation industry throughout the country justifies the modification of common-law rules by the Safety Appliance Acts and the Employers' Liability Acts applicable to interstate carriers, and would serve to sustain compensation acts of a broader scope, like those in force in many States. The collateral fact that such a law may produce contentment among employees—an object which as a separate and independent matter is wholly beyond the power of Congress—would not, of course, render the legislation unconstitutional. It is beside the point that compensation would have to be paid despite the fact that the carrier has performed its contract with its employee and has paid the agreed wages. Liability in tort is imposed without regard to such considerations; and in view of the risks of modern industry the substituted liability for compensation likewise disregards them. Workmen's compensation laws deal with existing rights and liabilities by readjusting old benefits and burdens incident to the relation of employer and employee. Before their adoption the employer was bound to provide a fund to answer the lawful claims of his employees; the change is merely in the required disbursement of that fund in consequence of the recognition that the industry should compensate for injuries occurring with or without fault. The act with which we are concerned seeks to attach to the relation of employer and employee a new incident, without reference to any existing obligation or legal liability, solely in the interest of the employee, with no regard to the conduct of the business, or its safety or efficiency, but purely for social ends.

The petitioners, in support of their argument as to morale, rely upon the voluntary systems adopted in past years by almost all the carriers, and now in operation. The argument runs that these voluntary plans were adopted in the industry for two principal reasons—the creation of loyalty and the encouragement of continuity in service. The petitioners quote from a statement by the National Industrial Conference Board the following:

"More specifically, the efficiency of the individual workers is stimulated by the feeling of security and hopefulness that results when the individual is relieved of the fear of destitution and dependency in old age and by the sentiment of loyalty and good will fostered by the pension plan, which thus operates as a spur to the ambition of the worker and incites him to more intensive and sustained effort. Similarly the efficiency of the organization as a whole is increased by the improvement of industrial relations, the development of a cooperative spirit, and the promotion of constancy and continuity of employment."

They assert that the Railroad Retirement Act, "although it embodies the first compulsory retirement and pension plan enacted in this country, is but the development of voluntary plans which have been in use in this country, particularly among the railroads, for more than a third of a century." The argument is self-contradictory. If, as is conceded, the purpose of the voluntary establishment of pensions is to create loyalty to the employer who establishes them, and continuity in his service, it seems axiomatic that the removal of the voluntary character of the pension and the imposition of it in such form as Congress may determine, upon all employers, and irrespective of length of service, or of service for the same employer, will eliminate all sense of loyalty or gratitude to the employer, and remove every incentive to continuance in the service of a single carrier. In fact, the petitioners so admit, for they say in their brief:

"That the benefits which respondents expected to derive from their voluntary pension plans (said to be (1) greater continuity of service and (2) improved employee loyalty) differ from those emphasized in the Retirement Act does not affect the act's validity, so long as it is calculated in other ways to promote efficiency and safety."

We are left to surmise what these "other ways" may be unless they are the contentment and assurance of security so much stressed in the argument. The petitioners, in effect, say: the carriers with certain objects and purposes have adopted voluntary systems; this proves that pensions are germane to the railroad business; Congress may legislate on any subject germane to interstate transportation; therefore Congress may for any reason or with any motive impose any type of pension plan. The contention comes very near to this—that whatever some carriers choose to do voluntarily in the management of their business at once invests Congress with the power to compel all carriers to do. The fallacy is obvious. The meaning of the commerce and due-process clauses of the Constitution is not so easily enlarged by the voluntary acts of individuals or corporations.

Counsel for the petitioners admit that "it may well be" voluntary plans are intended to promote efficiency and safety by "inducing loyalty and continuity", and "it could also be true that these means were ignored in the Retirement Act." They add:

"Congress has deliberately chosen the means of providing old-age security for all railroad employees, measured by years of service, but not dependent upon continuity of service with any particular carrier, as is required under the existing railway-pension systems. If it were true, as claimed, that the act will not encourage continuity of service and will remove the incentives for employee loyalty to employer, it has other virtues, as has been indicated; for example, it provides greater assurance to employees of old-age security than has been the case under the carriers' pension plans, and is likely to be productive of efficiency through improvement of employee morale."

Certainly the argument is inconsistent with any thought that a plan imposed by statute, requiring the payment of a pension, will promote the same loyalty and continuity of service which were the ends and objects of the voluntary plans. It is going far to say, as petitioners do, that Congress chose the more progressive method "already tried in the laboratory of industrial experience", which they claim has been approved and recommended by those qualified to speak. In support of the assertion, however, they cite general works dealing with voluntary pension plans, and not with any such compulsory system as that with which we are concerned. We think it cannot be denied, and, indeed, is in effect admitted, that the sole reliance of the petitioners is upon the theory that contentment and assurance of security are the major purposes of the act. We cannot agree that these ends, if dictated by statute, and not voluntarily extended by the employer, encourage loyalty and continuity of service. We feel bound to hold that a pension plan thus imposed is in no proper sense a regulation of the activity of interstate transportation. It is an attempt for social ends to impose by sheer fiat noncontractual incidents upon the relation of employer and employee, not as a rule or regulation of commerce and transportation between the States, but as a means of assuring a particular class of employees against old-age dependency. This is neither a necessary nor an appropriate rule or regulation affecting the due fulfillment of the railroads' duty to serve the public in interstate transportation.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia is affirmed.

The Chief Justice, dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the decision of this case. The gravest aspect of the decision is that it does not rest simply upon a condemnation of particular features of the Railroad Retirement Act, but denies to Congress the power to pass any compulsory pension act for railroad employees. If the opinion were limited to the particular provisions of the act, which the majority find to be objectionable and not severable, the Congress would be free to overcome the objections by a new statute. Classes of persons held to be improperly brought within the range of the act could be eliminated. Criticisms of the basis of payments, of the conditions prescribed for the receipt of benefits, and of the requirements of contributions could be met. Even in a place of unitary retirement system another sort of plan could be worked out. What was thus found to be inconsistent with the requirements of due process could be excised and other provisions substituted. But after discussing these matters the majority finally raise a barrier against all legislative action of this nature by declaring that the subject matter itself lies beyond the reach of the congressional authority to regulate interstate commerce. In that view, no matter how suitably limited a pension act for railroad employees might be with respect to the persons to be benefited, or how appropriate the measure of retirement allowances, or how sound actually the plan, or how well adjusted the burden, still under this decision Congress would not be at liberty to enact such a measure. That is a conclusion of such serious and far-reaching importance that it overshadows all other questions raised by the act. Indeed, it makes their discussion superfluous. The final objection goes, as the opinion states, "to the heart of the law, even if it could survive the loss of the unconstitutional features" which the opinion perceives. I think that the conclusion thus reached is a departure from sound principles and places an unwarranted limitation upon the commerce clause of the Constitution.

First, in defining the power vested in Congress to regulate interstate commerce, we invariably refer to the classic statement of Chief Justice Marshall. It is the power "to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed." The power "is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the Constitution" (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 196). It is a power to enact "all appropriate legislation for the protection and advancement" of interstate commerce (The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557, 564). "To regulate", we said in the Second Employers Liability cases (223 U. S. 1, 47), "in the sense intended, is to foster, protect, control and restrain, with appropriate regard for the welfare of those who are immediately concerned and of the public at large." And the exercise of the power, thus broadly defined, has had the widest range in dealing with railroads, which are engaged as common carriers in interstate transportation. As their service is vital to the Nation, nothing which has a real or substantial relation to the suitable maintenance of that service, or to the discharge of the responsibilities which inhere in it, can be regarded as beyond the power of regulation (The Shreveport case, 234 U. S. 342, 351; Dayton-Goose Creek Railway Co. v. United States, 263 U. S. 456, 478; Colorado v. United States, 271 U. S. 153, 163, 164; N. Y. Central Securities Co. v. United States, 287 U. S. 12, 24, 25).

It was inevitable that, with the development of the transportation system of the country, requiring a vast number of employees, there should have been a growing appreciation of the importance of conditions of employment. It could not be denied that the sovereign power to govern interstate carriers extends to the regulation of their relations with their employees who likewise are engaged in interstate commerce. The scope of this sort of regulation has been extensive. There has been not only the paramount consideration of safety, but also the recognition of the fact that fair treatment in other respects aids in conserving the peace and good order which are essential to the maintenance of the service without disastrous interruptions, and in promoting the efficiency which inevitably suffers from a failure to meet the reasonable demands of justice. An absolute duty to furnish safety appliances has been imposed, restrictions of hours of continuous service have been prescribed, standards of a day's work have been established for work and wages, the liability of carriers for injuries to employees has been regulated by the abrogation of the fellow-servant rule and the limitation of defenses as to contributory negligence and assumption of risk, and provisions have been enacted to facilitate the amicable settlement of disputes and to protect employees in their freedom to organize for the purpose of safeguarding their interests (St. Louis & Iron Mountain Railway Co. v. Taylor, 210 U. S. 281; Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 221 U. S. 612; Wilson v. New, 243 U. S. 332; Texas & New Orleans R. R. Co. v. Railway Clerks, 281 U. S. 548).

The argument that a pension measure, however sound and reasonable as such, is per se outside the pale of the regulation of interstate carriers, because such a plan could not possibly have a reasonable relation to the ends which Congress is entitled to serve, is largely answered by the practice of the carriers themselves. Following precedents long established in Europe, certain railroad companies in the United States set up voluntary pension systems many years ago. It appears that the first of these was established in 1884; another was adopted in 1900. By 1910 formal pension plans covered 50 percent of all railroad employees, and by 1927 over 82 percent. In establishing these plans the carriers were not contemplating the payment of a largess unrelated to legitimate transportation ends. Their witnesses say the carriers aimed at loyalty and continuity of service. However limited their motives, they acted upon business principles. Pension plans were not deemed to be essentially foreign to the proper conduct of their enterprises. But if retirement or pension plans are not per se unrelated to the government of transportation operations, Congress could consider such plans, examine their utility, and reach its own conclusions. If the subject matter was open to consideration, Congress was not limited to the particular motives which inspired the plans of the carriers.

The Government stresses the importance of facilitating the retirement of superannuated employees. The argument points to the conclusions of expert students as given in the testimony below, and to the reports of investigating committees and boards of leading business organizations. Employees' Retirement Annuities, Chamber of Commerce of the United States, 1932, pages 7, 8; Elements of Industrial Pension Plans, National Industrial Conference Board, 1931, pages 8, 10. Mr. Eastman, the Federal Coordinator of Transportation, in his affidavit on the hearing below, expressed the view that there was excessive superannuation among railroad employees. He says: "This excessive superannuation is detrimental to railroad service in several ways. Men who have grown old in the service decline in efficiency. The carrier pays in wages an amount out of proportion to the service rendered. These conditions exist upon the railroads at the present time. There is now a large body of superannuated employees in the railroad service who, for the good of the service, ought to be retired. Pension systems, of one sort or another, have been in existence in the railroad industry for as long as 50 years. The need for them was recognized by the more progressive carriers at an early date. In late years, particularly, with the voluntary systems in danger, the matter of retirement and pensions has been a crucial issue in railroad employment. Withdrawal or extensive curtailment of existing pensions in the railroad industry would impair the morale of railroad employees and play havoc with railroad labor relations. It would, in addition, increase the existing excessive superannuation among railroad employees and block the employment and promotion of younger men."

The carriers deny that there is excessive superannuation. They assert that the removal of older employees has no reasonable relation to either safety or efficiency. The opinion of the Court enters this field of controversy, reviews statistics as to the increase of safety and efficiency in operation during the period of the alleged increasing superannuation, and supports the finding that railroads are now operated more efficiently and safely than at any time in history. But that gratifying fact does not establish that further improvement is not needed or obtainable, or that a sound pension plan would not be of considerable benefit to the carriers' operations. At best, the question as to the extent of superannuation, and its effect, is a debatable one, and hence one upon which Congress was entitled to form a legislative judgment. As we said in Radice v. New York, 264 U. S. 292, 294: "Where the constitutional validity of a statute depends upon the existence of facts, courts must be cautious about reaching a conclusion respecting them contrary to that reached by the legislature; and if the question of what the facts establish be a fairly debatable one, it is not permissible for the judge to set up his opinion in respect of it against the opinion of the lawmaker." See Stephenson v. Binford, 287 U. S. 251, 272.

Laying that question on one side, I think that it is clear that the morale of railroad employees has an important bearing upon the efficiency of the transportation service, and that a reasonable pension plan by its assurance of security is an appropriate means to that end. Nor should such a plan be removed from the reach of constitutional power by classing it with a variety of conceivable benefits which have no such close and substantial relation to the terms and conditions of employment. The appropriate relation of the exercise of constitutional power to the legitimate objects of that power is always a subject of judicial scrutiny. With approximately 82 percent of railroad employees, 90 percent of those employed in cable, telephone, and telegraph companies, and about one-half of those in the service of electric railways, light, heat, and power companies under formal pension plans,¹² with the extensive recognition by National, State, and local governments of the benefit of retirement and pension systems for public employees in the interest of both efficiency and economy,¹³ it is evident that there is a wide-spread conviction that the assurance of security through a pension plan for retired employees is closely and substantially related to the proper conduct of business enterprises.

But with respect to the carriers' plans, we are told that as they were framed in the desire to promote loyalty and continuity of service in the employment of particular carriers, the accruing advantages were due to the fact that the plans were of a voluntary character. In short, that the reaction of the employees would be simply one of gratitude for an act of grace. I find no adequate basis for a conclusion that the advantages of a pension plan can be only such as the carriers contemplated or that the benefit which may accrue to the service from a sense of security on the part of employees should be disregarded. In that aspect, it would be the fact that protection was assured, and not the motive in supplying it, which would produce the desired result. That benefit would not be lost because the sense of security was fostered by a pension plan enforced as an act of justice. Indeed, voluntary plans may have the defect of being voluntary, of being subject to curtailment or withdrawal at will. And the danger of such curtailment or abandonment, with the consequent frustration of the hopes of a vast number of railroad workers and its effect upon labor relations in this enterprise of outstanding national importance, might well be considered as an additional reason for the adoption of a compulsory plan (Wilson v. New, supra, pp. 347, 348). There was also testimony (by Mr. Eastman) that "the experience with the voluntary-pension systems has been unsatisfactory", that "the depression brought clearly to light their many weaknesses and uncertainties."

The argument in relation to voluntary plans discloses the fundamental contention on the question of constitutional authority. In substance, it is that the relation of the carriers and their employees is the subject of contract; that the contract prescribes the work and the compensation; and that a compulsory pension plan is an attempt for social ends to impose upon the relation non-contractual incidents in order to insure to employees protection in their old age. And this is said to lie outside the power of Congress in the government of interstate commerce. Congress may, indeed, it seems to be assumed, compel the elimination of aged employees. A retirement act for that purpose might be passed. But not a pension act. The Government's power is conceived to be limited to a requirement that the railroads dismiss their superannuated employees, throwing them out helpless, without any reasonable provision for their protection.

The argument pays insufficient attention to the responsibilities which inhere in the carriers' enterprise. Those responsibilities, growing out of their relation to their employees, cannot be regarded as confined to the contractual engagement. The range of existing Federal regulation of interstate carriers affords many illustrations of the imposition upon the employer-employee relation of noncontractual incidents for social ends. A close analogy to the provision of a pension plan is suggested by the familiar examples of compensation acts. The power of Congress to pass a compensation act to govern interstate carriers and their employees engaged in interstate commerce does not seem to be questioned. The carriers might thus be compelled to provide appropriate compensation for injuries or death of employees, although caused without fault on the carriers' part. A thorough examination of the question of constitutional authority to adopt such a compulsory measure was made some years ago by a commission constituted under a joint resolution of Congress, of which Senator Sutherland (now Mr. Justice Sutherland) was chairman" (36 Stat. 884). Its elaborate and unanimous report, transmitted to Congress by President Taft with his complete approval, considered the constitutional question in all aspects, upheld the congressional power, and proposed its exercise (S. Doc. No. 338, 62d Cong., 2d sess.). Among the principles announced was that "If the proposed legislation effectuates any constitutional power, it is not rendered unconstitutional because to a greater or less extent it may accomplish or tend to accomplish some other result which, as a separate and independent matter, would be wholly beyond the power of Congress to deal with" (id., p. 26). The legislation was deemed to be a regulation of interstate commerce because, among other specified things, of its effect on the state of mind of the employee. On this point the Commission said: "By insuring to every employee engaged in interstate commerce definite compensation in case of his injury, and to his widow and children, or other dependents, in case of his death, irrespective of fault, the mind of the employee will, to a great extent, be relieved from anxiety for the future and he will be able to render better and more efficient and consequently safer service" (id., p. 28). The Commission explicitly pointed out that the legislation which it recommended was not based on any wrong or neglect of the carrier, "but upon the fact of injury resulting from accident in the course of the employment", that is, that accidents should be regarded "as risks of the industry" (id., p. 15). The circumstance that such a compensation measure has not been enacted by Congress is readily attributable to questions of policy rather than to any doubt of constitutional power.

The effort to dispose of the analogy serves only to make it the more impressive. Compensation acts are said to be a response to the demands which inhere in the development of industry, requiring new measures for the protection of employees. But pension measures are a similar response. If Congress may supply a uniform rule in the one case, why not in the other? If affording certainty of protection is deemed to be an aid to efficiency, why should that consideration be ruled out with respect to retirement allowances and be admitted to support compensation allowances for accidents which happen in the absence of fault? Compensation acts do not simply readjust old burdens and benefits. They add new ones, outside and beyond former burdens and benefits, and thus in truth add a new incident to the relation of employer and employee.

When we go to the heart of the subject, we find that compensation and pension measures for employees rest upon similar basic considerations. In the case of compensation acts, the carrier has performed his contract with the employee, has paid the agreed wages, has done its best to protect the employee from injury, is guilty of no neglect, but yet is made liable for compensation for injury or for death which ends the possibility of future service, because in the development of modern enterprises, in which accidents are inevitable, it has come to be recognized that the industry itself should bear its attendant risks (New York Central R. R. Co. v. White (243 U. S. 188); Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington (243 U. S. 219)). An attempted distinction as to pension measures for employees retired by reason of age, because old age is not in itself a consequence of employment, is but superficial. The common judgment takes note of the fact that the retirement of workers by reason of incapacity due to advancing years is an incident of employment and that a fair consideration of their plight justifies retirement allowances as a feature of the service to which they have long been devoted. This is recognized as especially fitting in the case of large industrial enterprises, and of municipal undertakings, such as police and fire protection, where there are stable conditions of employment in which workers normally continue so long as they are able to give service and should be retired when efficiency is impaired by age. What sound distinction, from a constitutional standpoint, is there between compelling reasonable compensation for those injured without any fault of the employer, and requiring a fair allowance for those who practically give their lives to the service and are incapacitated by the wear and tear of time, the attrition of the years? I perceive no constitutional ground upon which the one can be upheld and the other condemned.

The fundamental consideration which supports this type of legislation is that industry should take care of its human wastage, whether that is due to accident or age. That view cannot be dismissed as arbitrary or capricious. It is a reasoned conviction based upon abundant experience. The expression of that conviction in law is regulation. When expressed in the government of interstate carriers, with respect to their employees likewise engaged in interstate commerce, it is a regulation of that commerce. As such, so far as the subject matter is concerned, the commerce clause should be held applicable.

Second. With this opinion as to the validity of a pension measure if it is reasonably conceived, we are brought to the question of due process—whether the particular provisions of the retirement act now before us violate the requirement of due process which, under the fifth amendment, limits the exercise of the commerce power.

The most serious of the objections sustained by the Court on this score relates to the establishment of a unitary or pooling system for all railroads. It is said that in this respect the plan disregards the private and separate ownership of the respective carriers, treating them as a single employer, and illustrations are given to show that unequal burdens are thus imposed.

The objection encounters previous decisions of this Court. We have sustained a unitary or group system under State compensation acts against the argument under the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment (Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, supra). The Washington compensation act established a State fund for the compensation of workmen injured in hazardous employment, and the fund was maintained by compulsory contributions from employers in such industries. While classes of industries were established, each class was made liable for the accidents occurring in that class. The Court described the law as so operating that "the enforced contributions of the employer are to be made whether injuries have befallen his own employees or not, so that however prudently one may manage his business, even to the point of immunity to his employees from accidental injury or death, he nevertheless is required to make periodical contributions to a fund for making compensation to the injured employees of his perhaps negligent competitors" (id., pp. 236, 237). The statute was sustained in the view that its provisions did not rest upon the wrong or neglect of employers, but upon the responsibility which was deemed to attach to those who conducted such industries. The Court concluded "that the State acted within its power in declaring that no employer should conduct such an industry without making stated and fairly apportioned contributions adequate to maintain a public fund for indemnifying injured employees and the dependents of those killed, irrespective of the particular plant in which the accident might happen to occur" (id., p. 244). We followed the reasoning which had led to the upholding of State laws imposing assessments on State banks generally in order to create a guaranty fund to make good the losses of deposits in insolvent banks (Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104). See Abie State Bank v. Bryan (282 U. S. 765).

But, aside from these analogies, this Court has directly sustained the grouping of railroads for the purpose of regulation in enforcing a common policy deemed to be essential to an adequate national system of transportation, even though it resulted in taking earnings of a strong road to help a weak one. This was the effect of the recapture clause of Transportation Act, 1920, which required carriers to contribute their earnings in excess of a certain amount in order to provide a fund to be used by the Interstate Commerce Commission in making loans to other carriers (Dayton-Goose Creek Railway Co. v. United States, 263 U. S. 456). A distinction is sought to be made because the carriers, which were required to contribute, were permitted to retain a reasonable return upon their property. But what the strong roads were compelled to contribute were their own earnings resulting from just and reasonable rates—earnings which they were as clearly entitled to retain for their own benefit as the moneys which in the present instance are to be devoted to retirement allowances. The fact that the recapture provisions failed of their purpose and have been abandoned does not disturb the decision as to constitutional power. The principle that was applied had been made clear in the New England Divisions Case (261 U. S. 184). Transportation Act, 1920, had introduced into the Federal legislation a new railroad policy. To attain its purpose, "new rights, new obligations, new machinery, were created." "To preserve for the Nation substantially the whole transportation system was deemed important." "The existence of the varying needs of the several lines and of their widely varying earning power was fully realized." To attain the object "two new devices were adopted: The group system of rate making and the division of joint rates in the public interest. Through the former, weak railroads were to be helped by recapture from prosperous competitors of surplus revenues. Through the latter, the weak were to be helped by preventing needed revenue from passing to prosperous connections. Thus, by marshaling the revenues, partly through capital account, it was planned to distribute augmented earnings, largely in proportion to the carriers' needs" (id., pp. 189-191).

This object of adequately maintaining the whole transportation system may be served in more than these two ways. The underlying principle is that Congress has the power to treat the transportation system of the country as a unit for the purpose of regulation in the public interest, so long as particular railroad properties are not subjected to confiscation. In the light of that principle, and of applications which have been held valid, I am unable to see that the establishment of a unitary system of retirement allowances for employees is beyond constitutional authority. Congress was entitled to weigh the advantages of such a system, as against inequalities which it would inevitably produce, and reach a conclusion as to the policy best suited to the needs of the country. See Atlantic Coast Line v. Riverside Mills (219 U. S. 186, 203); Railroad Commission v. Southern Pacific Co. (264 U. S. 331, 343, 344).

Third. Questions are raised as to the classes of persons to be benefited. In considering these objections we should have regard to the explicit provision of the act as to severability. It states that if "any provision", "or the application thereof to any person or circumstances", is held invalid, "the remainder of the act or application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected." This, of course, does not permit us to rewrite the statute, but it does allow the excision of invalid provisions, or inclusions, which can be severed without destroying its structure.

(1) The court below held the act to be invalid in the view that its provisions were extended to persons not engaged in interstate commerce. In the special findings, classes of persons were listed, numbering 211,107, which were thought to fall within that description. It is manifest that the list was prepared under a misapprehension of the extent of the authority of Congress with respect to employees of interstate carriers and of the application of the decision in the first Employers' Liability Cases (207 U. S. 463). Large numbers of employees were thus deemed to be improperly included whose work, while not immediately connected with the movement of traffic, did have such relation to the activities of the carriers in interstate commerce as to bring them within the range of congressional power. Thus the list embraced general officers and their staffs who were not in the operating departments connected with transportation, employees who dealt with the receipt and disbursement of moneys, some 86,493 employees in the maintenance-of-equipment departments, who were engaged in the reconstruction or major repair of equipment, withdrawn for that purpose from service, such as locomotives, cars, platform trucks, frogs, switches, etc., as distinguished from light or running repairs, and 36,996 employees whose duties lay in auditing, accounting, and bookkeeping. It should be observed that the decisions under the Second Employers' Liability Act of 1908, with respect to the necessity of the employee being engaged at the time of his injury in interstate transportation or in work so closely related to transportation as to be a part of it, are based upon the limitations of that statute and do not define the scope of constitutional authority as to employees of interstate carriers (Illinois Central Railroad Company v. Behrens, 233 U. S. 473, 477; Chicago & Northwestern Railway Co. v. Bolle, 284 U. S. 74, 78).

Interstate carriers cannot conduct their interstate operations without general officers and their staffs, without departments for major repairs, and those for administering finances and keeping accounts. General management is as important to the interstate commerce of the carriers as is the immediate supervision of traffic, and the proper maintenance of equipment and the handling of moneys and the keeping of books are as necessary as the loading and moving of cars. In the administration of the act there would be ample opportunity to make all necessary distinctions between employees engaged in interstate commerce and any others who might be found to be otherwise exclusively employed, so as to exclude the latter from its benefits without impairing the general operation of the act.

(2) A more serious objection relates to the eligibility for allowances of all those who were in the service within 1 year prior to the enactment, although they may never be reemployed. Such persons may have been discharged for cause; in any event, for one reason or another, they had left the service and may not return.

I agree with the conclusion that the requirement that the carriers shall pay retiring allowances to such persons is arbitrary and beyond the power of Congress. But I think it clear that the provision for their benefit is within the clause as to severability. That application of the act may be condemned and such persons may be excluded from benefits without destroying the measure as a whole.

Fourth. Other questions relate to the details of the pension plan, principally with respect to the basis of the retirement allowances and the method of their computation.

With the excision of those whose employment was terminated before the act was passed, the plan would cover those in carrier service at that time and those subsequently employed. Retirement is compulsory at the age of 65, but the service may be extended by agreement for successive periods of 1 year each until the age of 70. An employee may retire upon completing 30 years of service, but in such case provision is made for reducing the annuity by one-fifteenth for each year below the age of 65. Annuities are calculated by applying graduated percentages of the employee's average monthly compensation (excluding all over $300) to the number of years of his service, not exceeding 30. The maximum annuity thus payable would be $1,440, and to receive that amount it would be necessary for the employee to have been in service 30 years and to have attained the age of 65, and to have been paid an average monthly compensation of $300. Contributions to the pension fund are to be made by employees of a certain percentage of their compensation and the contribution of each carrier is to be twice that of its employees.

An examination of pension plans in operation reveals a variety of possible methods, and Congress was entitled to make its choice. As a basis for the allowance, Congress could select either age or length of service, or both. In the selection of any age, or any period of service, anomalies would inevitably occur in particular applications. Extreme illustrations can always be given of the application of regulations which require the drawing of a line with respect to age, time, distances, weights, sizes, etc. To deny the right to select such criteria, or to make scientific precision a criterion of constitutional authority, would be to make impossible the practical exercise of power. Compare Sproles v. Binford (286 U. S. 374, 388, 389); Stanley v. Public Utilities Commission of Maine, decided April 15, 1935. Whatever may be said of the capacity of many men after they have attained 65 years, the fixing of that age or a period of 30 years' service, or a combination of both, for general application, cannot be regarded as an arbitrary choice for railroad employees.

The principal criticism is the bringing into the reckoning of past periods of service—antedating the passage of the act. The objection is strongly put with respect to those who were in the employment of the carriers when the act was passed, and it is even more earnestly urged as to those who had left the service and later are reemployed. It is said that the reckoning of their prior periods of employment compels payment for services fully completed and paid for before the enactment. But it seems to be assumed that Congress could compel the dismissal of aged employees, and if it has that power and also has power to establish a pension system, I can find no ground for erecting a constitutional limitation which would make it impossible to provide for employees who were thus severed from the service. The question simply is, What is a fair basis for computing a retirement allowance? Is the plan adopted by Congress destitute of rational support?

Congress could have provided for a retirement allowance in a flat sum, or could have based it upon the amount of compensation which the employee was receiving at the time of retirement, or upon the amount he had received for the preceding year or his average compensation of a longer time. Selecting a period not to exceed 30 years, or the period of service prior to age 65, merely gives a measure for the computation of the retirement allowance. It is in no proper sense a payment for the prior service, any more than would be the fixing of the allowance at a flat figure or on the basis of the last compensation received. The result in dollars and cents might not vary to any great extent whatever method of calculation was chosen.

The power committed to Congress to govern interstate commerce does not require that its government should be wise, much less that it should be perfect. The power implies a broad discretion and thus permits a wide range even of mistakes. Expert discussion of pension plans reveals different views of the manner in which they should be set up and a close study of advisable methods is in progress. It is not our province to enter that field, and I am not persuaded that Congress in entering it for the purpose of regulating interstate carriers, has transcended the limits of the authority which the Constitution confers.

I think the decree should be reversed.

I am authorized to state that Mr. Justice Brandeis, Mr. Justice Stone, and Mr. Justice Cardozo join in this opinion.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, communicated to the Senate the resolutions of the House unanimously adopted as a tribute to the memory of Hon. BRONSON CUTTING, late a Senator from the State of New Mexico, and also informed the Senate that the Speaker had appointed Mr. BLANTON, Mr. DEMPSEY, Mr. PLUMLEY, and Mr. MAAS members of the committee on the part of the House to attend the funeral of the late Senator CUTTING.

The message announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills of the Senate:

S. 147. An act to alter the amount apportioned to certain States for public employment offices affiliated with the United States Employment Service;

S. 613. An act to add certain public-domain land in Montana to the Rocky Boy Indian Reservation;

S. 707. An act to amend the act of May 19, 1926, entitled "An act to authorize the President to detail officers and enlisted men of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to assist the governments of the Latin American Republics in military and naval matters"; and

S. 2145. An act extending the time for repayment of the revolving fund for the benefit of the Crow Indians.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1616) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory and supplementary thereto, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution of the Senate, each with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 1776. An act granting a leave of absence to settlers of homestead lands during the year 1935; and

S. J. Res. 43. Joint resolution for the establishment of a commission for the construction of a Washington-Lincoln Memorial-Gettysburg Boulevard connecting the present Lincoln Memorial in the city of Washington with the battlefield of Gettysburg in the State of Pennsylvania.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 157. An act to amend section 5296 of the Revised Statutes of the United States;

H. R. 3012. An act to authorize the transfer of certain lands in Hopkins County, Ky., to the Commonwealth of Kentucky;

H. R. 4239. An act authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to convey to the city of Grand Haven, Mich., certain portions of the Grand Haven Lighthouse Reservation, Mich.;

H. R. 5456. An act relating to the powers and duties of United States marshals;

H. R. 5707. An act to ratify and confirm the corporate existence of the city of Nome, Alaska, and to authorize it to undertake certain municipal public works, including the construction, reconstruction, enlargement, extension, and improvement of its sewers and drains, fire-fighting system, streets and alleys, sidewalks, curbs and gutters, and a municipal building, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $100,000;

H. R. 6085. An act to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to undertake certain municipal public works, including the filling, grading, and paving of streets and sidewalks, the construction and improvement of sewers, and construction of necessary bridges and viaducts in connection with the same, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $40,000;

H. R. 6114. An act to amend section 128 of the Judicial Code, as amended;

H. R. 6371. An act to authorize an increase in the annual appropriation for books for the adult blind;

H. R. 6654. An act to increase the White House police force, and for other purposes;

H. R. 6723. An act to authorize the incorporated town of Valdez, Alaska, to construct a public-school building, and for such purpose to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $50,000; and to authorize said town to accept grants of money to aid it in financing any public works;

H. J. Res. 26. Joint resolution requesting the President to proclaim October 9 as Leif Erikson Day;

H. J. Res. 204. Joint resolution authorizing the erection of a memorial to the late Jean Jules Jusserand; and

H. J. Res. 272. Joint resolution to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to defray certain expenses incident to the convention of the Imperial Council of the Mystic Shrine, June 8 to 17, 1935, both inclusive.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. GLASS. I present the conference report on House bill 4442, being the bill providing appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the conference report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4442) Making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 10, 16, 20, 22, and 32.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 18, 19, 21, 26, and 27; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out and inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

"Salaries: For Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits and other personal services in the District of Columbia, including the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, $285,920.

"DIVISION OF DISBURSEMENT

"Salaries and expenses: For personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, stationery, travel, rental of equipment, and all other necessary miscellaneous and contingent expenses, $710,700: Provided, That with the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget there may be transferred to this appropriation from funds available for new activities or for the expansion of existing activities such sums as may be necessary to cover the additional expense incurred in performing the function of disbursement thereof."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "$261,668, of which $8,000 shall be immediately available for the suppression of an epidemic of typhus fever"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 17: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "five hundred and forty inspectors, $2,112,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert: "$12,825,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 29: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert: "$4,650,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 30: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert: "$575,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the word "hereafter" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "during the remainder of the fiscal year 1935 and during the fiscal year 1936"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference report in disagreement amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, 23, 24, 25, 33, and 34.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, before the report shall be adopted, I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia a question. Will he please indicate the fate of the amendment relating to the pay of certain employees in the Internal Revenue Service?

Mr. GLASS. I was just about to explain that, and if the Senator will permit me, I will do so after the Chair shall have laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on that and several other amendments.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report is agreed to.

The Chair now lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on certain amendments of the Senate, which will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
April 22, 1935.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2 to the bill (H. R. 4442) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes", and concur therein;

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3 to said bill and concur therein with the following amendment:

In line 3 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the words "Industrial Alcohol" and insert "Internal Revenue";

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4 to said bill and concur therein with the following amendment:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert:

"That the proviso to the paragraph under the heading 'Bureau of Internal Revenue' contained in the Emergency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1935, approved June 19, 1934, be amended to read as follows: 'Provided, That from and after May 15, 1935, no part of the appropriation made herein, or heretofore made, shall be used to pay the salaries of persons who were dropped from the service under the Executive Order Numbered 6166 of June 10, 1933, and reinstated, transferred, or promoted to positions in the Bureau of Industrial Alcohol, or in the Alcohol Tax Unit upon certificates issued by the Civil Service Commission between January 30, 1934, and May 10, 1934, unless such persons shall have passed an appropriate open competitive examination held by the Civil Service Commission after June 19, 1934, such persons being those who were separated from the service by Executive order of June 10, 1933, and who, under the terms of such order, were ineligible for reappointment unless such reappointments were made before December 10, 1933: Provided further, That inasmuch as the Treasury Department under the advice of the Attorney General, has given the proviso referred to above a construction including other employees not intended by the Congress to be included in that proviso and advising the Treasury Department that it could retain such employees without pay, there are hereby made available for salaries from December 1, 1934, to May 15, 1935, both dates inclusive, from the unexpended balances under the following titled appropriations, the sums, respectively, enumerated after each: 'Collecting the Revenue from Customs, 1935', $2,357.14, 'Collecting the Internal Revenue, 1935', $1,367,006.91, 'Salaries and Expenses, Bureau of Narcotics, 1935', $8,642.85, and 'Suppressing Counterfeiting and Other Crimes, 1935', $7,857.14, in all, $1,385,864.04, to pay all of said employees up to and including May 15, 1935: Provided further, That the employees, other than those heretofore, designated may be retained by the Treasury Department, but those designated in the first proviso hereof shall not be retained after May 15, 1935, by the Treasury Department unless they pass an appropriate noncompetitive examination to be held by the Civil Service Commission, and, if retained without having passed such noncompetitive examination, shall not be paid out of this appropriation or any other appropriation made by this act.";

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33 to said bill and concur therein with the following amendment:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert:

"Sec. 4. No part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid to any person for the filling of any position for which he or she has been nominated after the Senate upon vote has failed to confirm the nomination of such person.";

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34 to said bill and concur therein with the following amendment:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert "5"; and

That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 23, 24, and 25 to said bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I may clarify the situation by a brief word of explanation.

There were only three points in disagreement. The first related to an amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] to increase the appropriation for foreign-mail service by $2,000,000. That disagreement has delayed the presentation of a full report for the reason that an estimate from the Bureau of the Budget was promised to the Senator from California, and we had to wait for that estimate, which has not as yet been received. In view of the fact that it may hereafter be submitted, the item may be included in the deficiency-appropriation bill.

Another matter in dispute was the question as to whether the examination by the Civil Service Commission of certain employees in the Internal Revenue Bureau should be an open competitive examination or a noncompetitive examination, the Senate having voted for a noncompetitive examination.

The only remaining matter in disagreement, except one or two technical matters which do not affect the merits of the bill at all, was an amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] relating to the continuance in office of persons who have not been confirmed by the Senate. I assume all Senators are familiar with that matter. The committee made an immaterial addition, in which the House concurred.

I now move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 33, and 34, and that the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 23, 24, and 25.

The motion was agreed to.

POSTMASTER GENERAL'S REPORT ON OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to invite the attention of Senators to the fact that there has been distributed and is to be found on each Senator's desk the second part of the report made by the Postmaster General in connection with individual ocean mail contracts. I should like to suggest that Senators who are interested in the subject read the report. The report represents a careful analysis of the actual operation of the American merchant marine, after public hearings by the Postmaster General and through his assistants, where both the Government and the contractors were present. The report will give to Senators interested in the subject complete and definite information and will show the tremendous waste which has gone on over a period of years, the great favoritism, the dissipation of Government money, and the absolute failure to build up a merchant marine under the policy which has been pursued.

ELECTRIC RATE SURVEY, MASSACHUSETTS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of a compilation of domestic and residential rates for electricity in effect in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts on January 1, 1935, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 21

Whereas the long- and short-haul clause of the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act prohibits railroads from making a lesser charge for a longer than for a shorter distance over the same line in the same direction unless authorized to do so by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

Whereas the higher rail rates from Illinois and other States in the Middle West to the Pacific coast than water rates from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific coast through the Panama Canal have resulted in Middle West manufacturers losing all, or a substantial part of, their markets on the Pacific coast, to the advantage of their competitors located in the East; and

Whereas the elimination of the long- and short-haul clause from the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act would allow the railroads to establish reduced rates from the Middle West to the Pacific coast to meet this water competition without depressing below a reasonable level their rail rates to points inland from the Pacific coast where such water competition does not exist; and

Whereas such a readjustment of rail rates will enable Middle West manufacturers to regain a substantial part of their Pacific coast business, will result in increased employment in Middle West industries, will give added employment to labor in transporting such added rail traffic to the Pacific coast, and will enable the railroads to earn some additional net revenue to the advantage of farmers and residents generally of the Middle West and West who must employ the railroads to transport their products to market and furnish them with long-haul transportation; and

Whereas reduced rail rates from the Middle West to the Pacific coast will not result in eliminating eastern manufacturers from the Pacific coast markets or the boat lines from carrying traffic through the Canal, but will simply afford Middle West manufacturers an opportunity to compete with eastern manufacturers for a fair share of the Pacific coast business on a properly related basis of freight rates; and

Whereas the Middle West contributed by taxes to the construction of the Panama Canal and contributes to its maintenance and support and should be permitted to have a basis of rail rates which will prevent the Panama Canal from working an unjust discrimination against Middle West industries and employment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate of the fifty-ninth general assembly (the house of representatives concurring herein), That Congress be memorialized to eliminate the long- and short-haul clause from the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act or to modify the same so as to effectively permit railroads to establish rates to the Pacific coast from the Middle West which will enable Middle West industries to meet the competition of eastern manufacturers using water transportation through the Panama Canal; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to both houses of the Legislatures of North and South Dakota, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota; to the Vice President of the United States; the Speaker of the National House of Representatives; and the Senators and Congressmen from the State of Illinois.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the City Council of Cairo, Ill., favoring the enactment of legislation authorizing the Government to take over the assets of closed banks and to immediately pay depositors of such banks in full, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the State of New York, praying for an investigation of charges filed by the Women's Committee of Louisiana relative to the qualifications of the Senators from Louisiana [Mr. LONG and Mr. OVERTON], which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of the board of directors of the American Petroleum Institute, of New York City, N. Y., praying for the adoption of policies looking to the recovery of the petroleum industry, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Louis W. Wittenborn, of Hempstead, Long Island, N. Y., praying for the prompt enactment of bonus legislation for the benefit of World War veterans, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate telegrams in the nature of petitions from various civic, veterans', and other organizations, and sundry citizens of the United States, praying for the enactment of the so-called "Patman bonus bill" for the benefit of World War veterans, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH presented a resolution adopted by a meeting of the Fifth District Retail Drug Code Authority at Lowell, Mass., favoring the enactment of legislation extending the National Industrial Recovery Act, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Branch No. 96 of the Workmen's Sick and Death Benefit Fund, of Chelsea, Mass., favoring the enactment of the bill (H. R. 2827) to provide for the establishment of unemployment, old-age, and social insurance, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition from Bridge Tenders' Union, No. 12333, American Federation of Labor, of Boston, Mass., praying for the enactment of pending legislation relative to a graduated tax on cigarettes, to the end that cigarettes may sell at 10 cents a package, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Local No. 11, Amalgamated Silver Workers' Union, of Taunton, Mass., protesting against the advance in the price of raw silver, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Second Annual Convention of the National Leather Workers' Association held at Norwood, Mass., favoring the imposition of a tariff on all importations of finished leather and leather goods equal to the cost of production in the United States plus 10 percent, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Aerie No. 781, of Revere; Aerie No. 185, of Cambridge; and Aerie No. 1475, of Plymouth, all of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, in the State of Massachusetts, favoring inclusion in pending social-security legislation of a provision for Federal monetary assistance to the States paying old-age pensions, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the City Council of Worcester and the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of Peabody, both in the State of Massachusetts, protesting against continuance of the cotton-processing tax, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against alleged religious persecutions in the Republic of Mexico, and favoring the recall of the American Ambassador to that country, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Roosevelt Council, No. 45, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, of Lowell, Mass., favoring the enactment of legislation to strengthen the existing law pertaining to the deportation of aliens, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from Martha Thayer, of North Randolph, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called "Wheeler-Rayburn public-utility regulation bill", which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from George R. Nuzum, traffic manager of the Chamber of Commerce of Fall River, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to amend section 1 of the Interstate Commerce Act relative to a rate policy, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the City Council of Revere, Mass., favoring the enactment of the so-called "Patman bonus bill", which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the annual meeting of the Hampshire Association of Congregational Churches and Ministers at Amherst, Mass., protesting against the making of large military appropriations, and also against the holding of naval maneuvers in the Pacific Ocean, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH also presented the following concurrent resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, which were referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolutions relative to protection of American industry and employees from foreign competition

Whereas it is apparent that competition with foreign countries can no longer be met in many instances by greater manufacturing efficiency or by further increases in tariffs; and

Whereas, owing to low wage scales in foreign countries, the instability of foreign exchanges, and the disparity between the dollar and foreign currencies, it is too frequently possible for foreign producers to send quantities of their goods into the American domestic market sufficient to break that market and prevent the sale therein of American-made products; and

Whereas such disruption of the American market seriously interferes with the employment and earnings of American workers: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, requested to utilize fully the powers vested in him by section 3-e of the National Industrial Recovery Act to apply embargoes or establish quotas as a means of protecting American manufacturers and thus American workers against the losses they now suffer from foreign competition; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth forthwith forward copies of these resolutions to the President of the United States, to the Presiding Officers of both branches of Congress, and to the Members thereof from this Commonwealth.

Resolutions memorializing Congress in favor of requesting the President of the United States to exercise certain powers under the National Industrial Recovery Act for the benefit of the cotton-textile industry

Whereas by the provisions of the Act of Congress known as the "National Industrial Recovery Act" the President of the United States is alone empowered, through his proclamation and by his Executive order, or through such proclamation or by such order, to modify or rescind any provision of any portion of any code which has been set up for any industry under the act of Congress above referred to; and

Whereas the differentials which exist under the code relative thereto or which have grown up under long-continued practice, or which so exist and have so grown up, lay an intolerable burden upon the cotton-textile industry of Massachusetts and present an insuperable obstacle to the development and even the continuation of this industry in our Commonwealth: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the General Court of Massachusetts, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, requested to exercise the powers which he possesses under the National Industrial Recovery Act to the end that the cotton-textile industry throughout our country may proceed under conditions of economic equality, and that the readily apparent burdens which are now laid upon the cotton-textile industry in Massachusetts may be removed and that Massachusetts manufacturers and Massachusetts operatives may be assured that no discrimination is practiced against them; and be it further

Resolved, That the members in Congress from Massachusetts be, and they hereby are requested to act as a unit, together with such other Senators and Representatives in Congress as they may induce to join with them in this behalf, to accomplish the purpose of these resolutions; and be it further

Resolved, That His Excellency the Governor is hereby requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States, with such further representations as the Governor may see fit to make, and that the state secretary transmit a copy of these resolutions, under the seal of the Commonwealth, to each Member of the Congress from Massachusetts.

Mr. McADOO presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Assembly joint resolution relating to memorializing Congress to incorporate in a national old-age pension plan the principles and objectives of the Townsend plan

Whereas various proposals for the establishment of old-age pensions are now under consideration by the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas the revolving old-age-pension plan originated by Dr. F. E. Townsend, of California, has been presented to the United States Senate and the National House of Representatives; and

Whereas the program contemplates both relief for the aged and wide-spread adjustments in our economic system certain to result in improved working conditions and in extensive reduction of unemployment among thousands of men and women under the age of 60 years; and

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Congress of the United States is respectfully urged to enact H. R. 3977, introduced in the House of Representatives, January 16, 1935, and cited as the "Townsend Old-Age Revolving Pension Act", which is as follows:

"Sec. 2. That every citizen of the United States, 60 years of age and over, or who shall attain the age of 60 years after the passage of this act, while actually residing in the United States, shall be entitled to receive, upon application and qualification, a pension in the sum of $200 per month during the life of the pensioner: Provided, That (a) the pensioner shall discontinue and refrain from all gainful competitive pursuits or salaried positions of any kind; (b) the pensioner shall covenant and agree that he or she will within 30 days of receipt of said pension expend all of the same for goods, commodities, or services within the jurisdiction of the United States (c) proof of age and citizenship shall be according to the law and procedure of the State of residence of the pensioner; and (d) this pension shall be wholly exempt from attachment, garnishment, or execution.

"Sec. 3. There is hereby levied a tax of 2 percent on the gross dollar value of each business, commercial, and/or financial transaction done within the United States. The President of the United States is hereby empowered by Executive order to increase or decrease the 2-percent tax by not more than 50 percent, when in his discretion he deems it advisable, in order to adequately finance the said pension roll. This tax shall be levied in addition to any other Federal tax on goods or commodities. This tax so levied shall be paid by the seller once each calendar month, calculated on the seller's aggregate gross sales, in accordance with rules and regulations to be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

"(a) It is hereby provided in order to facilitate the collection of this tax that all sellers of goods, commodities, and commercial things of value shall obtain a license upon payment of a fee, the amount thereof to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is empowered with full authority to use his discretion as to methods and means of collecting this tax.

"Sec. 4. Any qualified pensioner who, for any justifiable reason, has failed to legally receive and disburse said pension, may, upon proper proof, be reinstated and thereafter receive the pension.

"(a) All pensioners under this act shall be permitted to expend not more than 15 percent of each monthly pension for charity, church, and fraternal organizations.

"(b) Pensioners under this act shall receive no other pension from the United States nor from any State nor any political subdivision thereof, except all disabled war veterans now receiving or who may receive disability allowance, compensation, or pension from the United States Government.

"(c) The benefits of this act shall not accrue to any person while an inmate of an insane asylum, eleemosynary institution, or while under penal sentence in any jail or penitentiary.

"Sec. 5. Immediately after the passage of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall authorize all national and State banks, members of the Federal Insurance Deposit Corporation, to credit each properly identified pensioner the first day of each calendar month in the sum of $200, and said banks shall be reimbursed by the United States Treasury for the amounts so credited to pensioner or pensioners.

"Sec. 6. All salaries for individual services are hereby exempted from the tax provisions of this act.

"Sec. 7. Pensions under this act shall be forfeited or discontinued for the following reasons:

"(a) Any person who has been duly convicted of a felony shall be ineligible for this pension for a period of 10 years following the completion of his sentence.

"(b) Any pensioner under this act who is convicted of a felony shall immediately forfeit his said pension.

"(c) Any pensioner who violates the conditions imposed by (a) and (b) of section 2 of this act may be deprived of the said pension.

"Sec. 8. The Secretary of the Treasury shall appoint pension boards of three members, who shall constitute a district pension board. No two members of this board may belong to the same political party. Such boards may appoint deputies within their districts. All members of the board shall serve without compensation other than their pensions. Such boards shall have supervision of the administration of this act in their respective districts and shall be governed by rules and regulations promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury. A pension board shall be so set up for each county in the United States other than the areas of metropolitan cities wherein boards shall be created in each ward or similar political subdivision.

"Sec. 9. Any and all oaths or affirmations required under the provisions of this act may be administered by any officer authorized by the law of any State to take acknowledgments for the conveyance of real property or by any member of a duly constituted pension board as herein provided.

"Sec. 10. It shall be a felony and punishable as such for any pensioner or seller as herein described to misrepresent or make a false statement with regard to any provisions of this act, with intent to defraud the Government of the United States under penalty of a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both."

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to forward a copy of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. McADOO also presented the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Assembly joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and Congress to favorably consider and submit to the States an amendment to the Constitution enabling Congress to grant Federal suffrage to residents of the District of Columbia

Whereas the District of Columbia, with its half million people, is the only community in the United States which is denied representation in the National Government;

Whereas the men and women residing in the District of Columbia have no voice in determining through a vote for President, Vice President, and spokesmen in Congress the policies of the Nation in which they live, either in war or in peace;

Whereas the District of Columbia taxpayers must pay what they are assessed without opportunity to determine the nature of their taxes or the purposes for which the money is spent;

Whereas it is a fundamental principle of our Republic that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed: Be it therefore

Resolved, by the Assembly and the Senate of California, jointly, That the President and the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully urged to set in motion the machinery for correcting this present un-American condition of the residents of the District of Columbia by submitting to the States for ratification the constitutional amendment enabling Congress to make it possible for residents of the District of Columbia to vote for President, Vice President, and Representatives of Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that such Senators and Members from California are hereby respectfully urged to support such legislation.

Assembly joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and the Congress to enact legislation (H. R. 2772) declaring admission day a holiday for all officers and employees of the United States whose headquarters are in California

Whereas the 9th day of September is the day when all persons residing in California celebrate the admission of the "Golden State" into the Union; and

Whereas this day of celebration is one of great sentiment to the people of the State of California; and

Whereas the 9th day of September of each year is an official holiday for all public employees of the State of California and political subdivisions thereof; and

Whereas many organizations, together with the Native Sons of the Golden West, have sponsored the plan to allow officers and employees of the United States whose headquarters are in California to celebrate and honor the admission day of California; and

Whereas on January 3, 1935, there was introduced by Mr. ENGBRIGHT, of California, a bill known as "H. R. 2772", which proposes to declare the 9th day of September of each year, which is the date California was admitted to the Union, a legal holiday for all officers and employees of the United States whose headquarters are in the State of California: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, respectfully urge the President and the Congress of the United States to enact H. R. 2772, which proposes to provide a legal holiday for Federal employees; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and the Vice President of the United States, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that such Senators and Members from California are hereby respectfully urged to support such legislation.

Mr. McADOO also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Assembly joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and the Congress to enact the required legislation for complete and adequate antiaircraft equipment and personnel as defensive measures for the Pacific coast

Whereas during recent times there has been a great deal of public interest and discussion in regard to the inadequacy of aircraft and personnel defense on the Pacific coast; and

Whereas, as a result of such discussion and study on the part of representative organizations of the State of California and military authorities, it seems clear that there is very apparent weakness in the antiaircraft defense and personnel of the Pacific coast; and

Whereas investigations made and information compiled by Joseph G. McComb Post, No. 46, of the American Legion, conclusively demonstrates the inadequacy of the antiaircraft defense on the Pacific coast; and

Whereas California has only one antiaircraft detachment with a complement of 24 officers and 323 men to cover and protect the entire length of the California coast line; and

Whereas at some forts on the Pacific coast there are only 8 fixed antiaircraft guns and in other instances only 2 such guns; and

Whereas the War Department of the United States has recommended that the minimum number of antiaircraft units, in time of peace, should total 10 complete regiments; and

Whereas antiaircraft equipment and personnel are essential as defense measures for the Pacific coast and form one arm of the military services which cannot possibly be construed as anything but purely defensive in nature: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the President and the Congress of the United States are respectfully urged to enact the legislation required for complete antiaircraft equipment and personnel on the Pacific coast; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that such Senator and Members from California are hereby respectfully urged to support such legislation.

Mr. FLETCHER presented the following memorial of the Legislature of the State of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Memorial to Congress requesting that the Congress of the United States without further delay pass the Bland bill, H. R. 7569

Whereas there are five menhaden fish fertilizer plants located in different sections of the State of Florida employing over 2,000 of our citizens; and

Whereas there is a great amount of menhaden-fish scrap and menhaden-fish meal being shipped into the United States and into the State of Florida by foreign nations, who, because of cheap labor, can sell their products at a price far below the cost of producing these products in our State; and

Whereas unless relief is given the citizens of our State connected with the menhaden-fish industry will be forced out of business and employment of our citizens will be curtailed; and

Whereas the Bland bill, being H. R. 7569 in the Congress of the United States, provides for a five-eighths of a cent tax on each pound of menhaden-fish meal and menhaden-fish scrap shipped into this country by other nations; and

Whereas the Bland bill has the endorsement of those citizens of the States of Virginia and Maryland engaged in this industry, as well as a great many of the people of our country; and

Whereas enactment of this bill into law will have a vital effect on the menhaden-fish industry in our Nation and our State; and

Whereas it alone will increase by $300,000 the annual pay rolls of the five menhaden fish fertilizer plants in this State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of your memorialists, the members of the Florida Legislative Assembly of the State of Florida, the Senate and the House concurring, that the Congress of the United States should enact the Bland bill without further delay; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial, duly authenticated, be sent by the secretary of state to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from this State, to the President of the United States, and to Congressman SCHULER O. BLAND.

Mr. FLETCHER also presented the following memorial of the Legislature of the State of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

Senate Memorial 6

Whereas the city of Palatka, Putnam County, Fla., has, with the cooperation and the financial assistance of the Federal Government, converted its municipal waterworks property into one of the outstanding beauty spots of not only Florida but of the entire Nation; and

Whereas great numbers of citizens of the United States, including residents of every State in the Union, have, during the winter season just closed, visited and enjoyed Palatka's Ravine Azalea Gardens; and

Whereas the gardens, with their thousands of azaleas, magnolias, flame vines, crepe myrtles, cherokee roses, and a profusion of tropical plantings, has attained to the proportions far beyond local or even State-wide interest and scope: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Florida, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully memorialized to enact the necessary legislation to authorize the United States Government to receive and accept as a gift from the city of Palatka, in the State of Florida, the said Palatka Ravine Azalea Gardens, embracing 85 acres of land, and all plantings and improvements thereon, and to constitute and maintain such gardens as a national park or garden for the pleasure, education, and edification of all persons seeking beauty in and knowledge of flowers, vines, plants, and native trees such as are found in this place of indescribable beauty; and be it

Resolved further, That the secretary of state of the State of Florida is directed to transmit a duly authenticated copy of this memorial, under the great seal of the State, to the Congress of the United States, and to each of Florida's Senators and Representatives in the Congress; and that our said Senators and Representatives are most earnestly requested to employ their best efforts to induce the Congress to act favorably to the accomplishment of the purposes outlined in this memorial.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

House Concurrent Resolution 50

Whereas the entire cotton crop of the United States is produced in 13 Southern States; and

Whereas the grain crops of the State of Texas are of vital importance to the citizens of the State of Texas; and

Whereas the State of Texas, and particularly the farmers of the State of Texas are vitally interested in the production and sale of cotton, cotton products, grain, and grain products, and in the production and sale of other major crops raised in this State; and

Whereas the general prosperity depends to a great extent on the prosperity of the farmers of the State; and

Whereas Texas produces practically one-third of the cotton produced in the United States, 90 percent of which production is exported to foreign countries; and

Whereas the maintenance of the foreign markets affording a fair price for the cotton produced in this State is of vital concern to all of the people of Texas; and

Whereas statistics show that from August 1, 1934, to March 1, 1935, the American cotton exports were 2,321,000 bales less than for the same period of time the year previous; and

Whereas statistics show that American gin manufacturing companies, during the year of 1934, sold to foreign cotton-growing countries more than five and one-half times as much gin machinery as in any previous year; and

Whereas it is of vital importance and much concern to all the people of Texas that stable and satisfactory markets be provided and maintained for all crops grown in the State of Texas; and

Whereas the gravity of the cotton-export situation and the market with reference to other major crops in the State of Texas as to the production, control, and marketing of the same is alarming to the cotton- and grain-growing States: Now be it therefore

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Texas (the Senate of Texas concurring), That the Speaker of the House of Representatives appoint five members of the House of Representatives to serve with a committee of five members of the Senate, appointed by the Lieutenant Governor of Texas, to make a study of the cotton-growing and cotton-marketing situation as well as the production, control, and marketing of other crops in the State of Texas affecting not only the State of Texas but the entire Southern States with the view of making recommendations to the Legislature of Texas and to the Members of Congress from Texas, of any suggested plans and proposals that will remedy the existing conditions and that will be calculated to stabilize the production, control, and marketing of said cotton and grain production, and also the study and make recommendations as to the feasibility of forming a cotton compact with all other cotton-producing States in order that not only the State of Texas but the entire South may be well represented and considered in legislation passed by the Congress of the United States affecting the production of cotton and the production, control, and marketing of the grain crops grown in the State of Texas, and also for said committee appointed to study the feasibility of requesting the legislatures of all cotton-producing States, and those producing grain crops similar to those produced in Texas, to name similar committees to meet with the committee appointed herein in order to formulate similar plans for State legislation as well as national legislation affecting the production and sale of cotton and the production, control, and marketing of major grain crops; and be it further

Resolved, That said committee shall have the power and authority to employ and compensate all necessary employees and it shall be the duty of said committee to make and keep the records of its investigation; that said committee shall begin and complete its investigation and study at the earliest practical moment, and shall submit a report in writing as soon as possible, and in no event later than the first day of October 1935, or as soon thereafter as possible, that a copy of said report shall be filed with the Governor of the State of Texas, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Governor of each of the cotton-growing States in the United States, and to the President of the United States, the Vice President, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives at Washington, and to each of the Congressmen from Texas; and be it further

Resolved, That the compensation and expenses herein provided for incident to such investigation and study not to exceed $5,000 shall be paid out of the appropriation for mileage and per diem and contingent expenses of the forty-fourth legislature, upon sworn account of persons entitled to such pay when approved by the chairman of said committee, and sufficient money is hereby appropriated out of the mileage and per diem and contingent fund of said forty-fourth legislature to meet the payment of expenses of the members of said committee and all necessary employees and other expenses incident to said investigation.

Mr. SHEPPARD also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 42

Whereas the President of the United States has seen the necessity for social-welfare legislation, resulting in the social security act now pending before the National Congress, which act has to do with child welfare, the aged, the crippled, and other unfortunates; and

Whereas the act calls for the appointment of a social security board of three members, to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate; and

Whereas the entire Texas delegation in Congress, and the "party leaders", State and National, have personally submitted to the President the name of a distinguished Texan, former Senator Margie E. Neal, of Carthage, Tex., for membership on the social security board, if and when, the bill is enacted into law; and

Whereas while a member of the State senate, Senator Neal espoused such humanitarian legislation as rehabilitation of civilian cripples and hospitalization and treatment of crippled children, as well as various welfare measures of a benevolent nature; and

Whereas the State legislature and the citizens of Texas, who are interested in the program of social welfare contemplated by the Government, are now afforded the opportunity to cooperate with the Texas delegation in the National Congress in bringing to the attention of the administration, one who is preeminently qualified by training, education, experience, and association to serve the Nation in this humanitarian endeavor; and

Whereas Senator Neal is not only generally but intimately well versed and experienced in matters pertaining to philanthropy, thereby rendering her most capable of performing a unique service as a member of said social security board; and

Whereas Texas would not only do honor to itself and to the Nation, but would reflect credit of the highest degree upon the American people as a whole, in bringing about the selection and elevation of our distinguished former member to this important post: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of Texas (the house of representatives concurring), That we also endorse Miss Neal, our former respected and beloved colleague, for membership on the Federal social security board, and convey to the President our opinion that in naming her to this position, he will honor Texas and the Nation, and will serve well the cause of human welfare, which is so very near his heart; and be it further

Resolved, That we commend Miss Neal to the President as a citizen of the highest integrity; as a publisher who always espoused the cause of benevolence, righteous living, and good government; as a public official, who served her State long and well; as a capable, conscientious, and effective social worker; as an ardent supporter of much welfare legislation; as a forward-looking public servant who at all times had the interests of all concerned at heart; and be it further

Resolved, That she be commended for her "party loyalty and yeoman service"; for her acknowledged leadership and her directorship of two Democratic National Campaigns in Texas, with some of Texas' most distinguished and worthy "party leaders"; for her services as director of finance for the Democratic National Committee, under National Treasurer Cordell Hull; for representing the party as delegate-at-large in all national conventions but one in the past 20 years, and for having been cited for distinguished service to the party by Texas Young Democrats at their Jefferson Day dinner in 1934, when they bestowed certificates of honorable service upon 25 Texas Democrats; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Vice President John N. Garner, Hon. James Farley, and Mrs. James H. Wolfe of the Democratic National Committee, Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD and Hon. TOM CONNALLY, our United States Senators from Texas, and Hon. MORGAN SANDERS and Hon. MARTIN DIES, Members of Congress, expressing to them our keen desire that Hon. Margie E. Neal, our beloved citizen and patriot without a peer, be favored with this appointment.

Mr. SHEPPARD also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 38

Whereas the Brazos Watershed contains one-sixth of the area and 27 percent of the population of the State of Texas, being practically as large as each of the States of New York or Pennsylvania, and being larger in area than the whole of the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Delaware, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New Jersey, and containing a greater population than the whole of the States of Wyoming, Idaho, Nevada, Arizona, and New Mexico combined; and

Whereas this great area contains much of the richest and most fertile lands in the Union and is favored by a climate mild enough to make it an ideal home for a great people; and

Whereas this great area is subject to recurrent and disastrous overflows, destroying the lands, crops, and homes of the residents of the valley, and is at other seasons afflicted with drought and shortage of water, both of which conditions can and should be remedied by proper control of the waters of the stream and its tributaries; and

Whereas the Texas Board of Water Engineers has heretofore prepared a master plan for the control of the waters of the Brazos River and its tributaries, so that same may be controlled and stored for beneficial use and the valley protected from flood and drought, the flow of the streams may be assured, and a generous supply of hydroelectric power may be produced; and

Whereas the Legislature of Texas has heretofore made appropriate provision for the development of this great project as a coordinated whole and in keeping with a well-worked-over engineering plan; and

Whereas the State of Texas has through its legislature heretofore evidenced its good faith in this project by creating a number of years ago a public agency, known as the "Brazos River Conservation and Reclamation District", and by making available for the assistance of said district in the construction of dams, reservoirs, and other structures necessary for the control of said river the sum of $6,180,000 of State tax money; and

Whereas we know of no State which has evidenced its belief in the stability and soundness in any public-works project in such a substantial manner as has the State of Texas; and

Whereas no substantial amount of public work has been done in the State of Texas, and less than $3,000,000 of the $60,000,000 allotted to Texas for public works has actually been made available as yet in this State; and

Whereas the Federal Government has long followed the policy of aiding in and in many cases paying all of the cost of constructing many less comprehensive projects, and this without any substantial State aid, but said Government has not assisted in any project of outstanding magnitude in this State; and

Whereas bills have been introduced in both the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States by Hon. LUTHER JOHNSON and by our Senators, respectively, which bills are identical and provide for substantial Federal aid to assist the Brazos River Conservation and Reclamation District in constructing the necessary works to effect the control of the Brazos River and its tributaries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of Texas (the house of representatives concurring), That the United States Senators and Representatives from this State in the Federal Congress be, and they are hereby, urged to exert their utmost efforts to secure speedy and favorable action on the aforementioned legislation providing for Federal aid to the Brazos River Conservation and Reclamation District.

Mr. SHEPPARD also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 35

Whereas the Democratic Party of Texas in convention assembled on September 11, 1934, adopted the following plank in the party platform:

"We oppose the abdication or surrender of the State's power to control the production of its natural resources. We likewise oppose any Federal encroachment upon the exclusive power of this State to control the production of oil and gas. We oppose any plan that results in the arbitrary compulsory utilization of oil fields"; and

Whereas there is pending at this time before the Committee on Mines and Mining of the United States Senate a bill, known as the "Thomas bill", which has for its purpose the attempted regulation of the production of oil within the States; and

Whereas the purpose of said bill is directly contrary to the principles contained in the platform of the Texas democracy and contrary to the principles of our dual form of government in that it is an attempted invasion of the sovereign powers of this and other States of the Union: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of Texas (the house of representatives concurring), That the Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress be, and they are hereby, respectfully petitioned and requested to oppose the adoption of the so-called "Thomas bill" or other similar bills; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate and the chief clerk of the house of representatives be, and they are hereby, instructed to mail a copy of this resolution to the members of the Texas delegation in the Congress of the United States, to the Presiding Officers of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and to the Chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining of the United States Senate, and to the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHEPPARD also presented the following resolution of the Senate of the State of Texas, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Senate Resolution 89

Whereas for several years the United States Government has been interested in a central military superhighway from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico; and

Whereas President Roosevelt has stressed the need for such a highway from the standpoint of safety, as well as the necessity for commercial and military purposes; and

Whereas the United States Government has enacted into law the $4,880,000,000 relief- and work-project bill; and

Whereas a vast amount of this money will be put into highway construction; and

Whereas the proposed central military superhighway will tend to bring closer the relationship between the North and South for commercial and other purposes: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Texas, That His Excellency the President of the United States, the Members of Congress, and the United States Senate give consideration to the designation and allocation of funds to construct Highway No. 8 from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to His Excellency Franklin D. Roosevelt and to each Member of the House and Senate of the Congress of the United States from Texas, in order that they may be acquainted with the necessity of this much-needed project.

PETITION RELATIVE TO PENDING LABOR LEGISLATION

Mr. BACHMAN. I present a petition from citizens of Hamilton County, Tenn., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, without the names, and appropriately referred. Also, I wish to have it appear in the RECORD that similar requests have been made by 2,155 citizens of the State of Tennessee.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to lie on the table, and the body thereof to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., April 13, 1935.

We, the undersigned citizens of Hamilton County, request our Representatives in Congress to vote favorably on the following bills:

1. Back President in his program of extension of the N. R. A.
2. Wagner labor-disputes No. 6288.
3. Connery bill No. 6450, labor representation on the codes.
4. Connery Resolution No. 141, to prohibit use of Federal arms and supplies during strikes without express authority of the Secretary of War.
5. Byrnes bill No. 2039, to stop shipment of strikebreakers over the State lines during strikes.

We request that this petition be read and be made a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

TOWNSEND OLD-AGE-PENSION PLAN

Mr. LONERGAN presented a resolution adopted by sundry citizens and affiliate members of Townsend Old Age Pension Plan Club, No. 1, of Manchester, Conn., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A memorial to the President of the United States, the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled

We, your memorialists, the 3,000 petitioners and 500 affiliate members of the Townsend Old Age Pension Plan Club, No. 1, of Manchester, Conn., respectfully represent:

Whereas there is pending before the Senate of the United States a measure known as the "revised (McGroarty) Townsend old-age-pension bill"; and

Whereas said bill setting forth the plan to have the Government provide the initial sum calculated at a rate sufficiently high to provide the necessary revenue to meet the requirements of said bill; and

Whereas it is obvious that said bill will, at the beginning of its operation, place in the hands of the general public such purchasing power as to stimulate every avenue of commerce and trade. The banking system which stagnates the monetary flow of currency has proven inadequate to keep trade and commerce at an even tempo, free from panics and depressions; and

Whereas the tax levy as provided in the revised McGroarty bill for the express purpose of paying the Townsend revolving pension (trust fund) of those who qualify will relieve society from a tremendous burden of taxation now made necessary by the maintenance of Government and civic relief, community chests, and all forms of charitable institutions. The fund would provide a steady flow of a monetary circulation from the taxpayer to the Government, revolving back to the pensioner (trustee) and thence to the channels of trade: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the senior Senator of the State of Connecticut enlist the service of the junior Senator of said State, together with other Members of the Senate, to have the McGroarty (Townsend) bill given an impartial period of time for debate and that a record vote attained, and, if possible, an insertion of this memorial be placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

We further pray.

SIDNEY ELLIOTT,
President of Club.
KATHERINE DE HARDY,
Secretary of Club.
JOHN H. C. LONGDYKE,
Treasurer of Club.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1811. A bill providing for the publication of statistics relating to spirits of turpentine and rosin (Rept. No. 578); and

S. 2652. A bill to authorize the President to attach certain possessions of the United States to internal-revenue collection districts for the purpose of collecting processing taxes (Rept. No. 579).

Mr. FRAZIER, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 212) to liquidate and refinance agricultural indebtedness at a reduced rate of interest by establishing an efficient credit system, through the use of the Farm Credit Administration, the Federal Reserve banking system, and creating a Board of Agriculture to supervise the same, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 580) thereon.

Mr. POPE, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bill (S. 1476) to provide for unemployment relief through development of mineral resources, to assist the development of privately owned mineral claims, to provide for the development of emergency and deficiency minerals, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 581) thereon.

Mr. CAREY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3721) for the relief of Angelo J. Gillotti, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 582) thereon.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

H. R. 972. A bill for the relief of John Costigan (Rept. No. 583); and

H. R. 2192. A bill for the relief of Harry B. Walmsley (Rept. No. 584).

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1454) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish bronze markers for certain graves, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 586) thereon.

Mr. MINTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1846) for the relief of Daniel W. Seal, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 587) thereon.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 2688) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the manner in which property shall be sold under orders and decrees of any United States courts", approved March 3, 1893, as amended, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 585) thereon.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which were referred the following bill and joint resolution, reported them each with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

H. R. 4751. A bill to amend section 24 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, with respect to the terms of office of members of the Interstate Commerce Commission (Rept. No. 589); and

S. J. Res. 112. Joint resolution extending the effective period of the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act, 1933 (Rept. No. 588).

CONVENTION OF IMPERIAL COUNCIL OF THE MYSTIC SHRINE

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, from the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 272) to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to defray certain expenses incident to the convention of the Imperial Council of the Mystic Shrine, June 8 to June 17, 1935, both inclusive. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. It carries an appropriation of $54,000 to enable the Commissioners of the District to furnish additional municipal services and to perform additional duties which are imposed upon the District in taking care of the convention of the Imperial Council of the Mystic Shrine to be held next month. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for carrying out the provisions of Public Resolution No. 14, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved April 24, 1935, within the limitations and for the several purposes therein expressed, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $54,000, to be payable from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

MANIPULATION OF THE COTTON MARKETS

Mr. SMITH. From the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I report back favorably without amendment Senate Resolution 125, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. It is simply a resolution extending the scope of the committee which is investigating the cotton question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 125, submitted by Mr. SMITH on the 2d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That in addition to the authority conferred upon the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, under Senate Resolution No. 103, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, agreed to March 16, 1935, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, shall have authority to investigate, with a view to determining whether there has been any manipulation, direct or indirect, of the cotton markets, or any undue influence thereupon in connection with the issuance or publication of cotton reports or statements, (1) the causes of the decline of the price of cotton on the cotton exchanges prior to March 11, 1935, and (2) the activities of the Department of Agriculture, cotton exchanges, cotton merchants, cotton millers, bankers, and any other persons, firms, or corporations connected with the cotton business.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the Senator asking for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMITH. The original resolution has already passed the Senate. This one simply makes clear some points of doubt.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I wish to introduce, for the consideration of the Senate, a joint resolution to clarify an issue which has, during the past several years, become confused in the minds of the people of this country.

Just 18 years ago the American people engaged in war, made sacrifices, and endured hardship with the fervent hope of thereby obtaining a lasting peace. That mission has apparently failed, and, again, disturbed conditions in Europe have created the fear that another great war may occur within the next few years.

In the minds of millions of people is the question, How can America stay out of such a war? This question is now being discussed throughout the country with an interest and a vigor seldom witnessed. Proposals for changing the rules of neutrality, for regulating traffic in arms, and for taking the profits out of war, have been made in the Congress.

There is much sentiment for more stringent neutrality laws. It is even suggested that a complete embargo be established on all exports with belligerents during war. It is widely thought that by surrendering our neutral rights under international law, by prohibiting loans to belligerents, by refusing passports for travel on the high seas, by denying protection to American citizens and property in other lands, and by a series of other legislative inhibitions, we can stay out of war even where the other great powers of the world are engaged in a life-and-death struggle.

I am entirely in sympathy with the desire to remain out of any armed conflict, and I will support such legislative inhibitions as those mentioned; but I am convinced that this procedure is an inadequate reliance for the safety of any nation, and may in the end even provoke war. Mere negative action will never suffice. The world will never bring peace and lay it in our laps. We must make a conquest of it by constructive united effort.

The paramount desire of the people of this country, and of every country, is for peace. They are interested in neutrality legislation only as a way to peace. They are interested, as I am interested, in preventing war. Such prevention is far more important than trying to stay out of a war after it is started. No legislation has been proposed looking toward the permanent way to this objective.

For some time I have considered the introduction of a joint resolution which, it seems to me, points to the only way to obtain enduring peace; that is, the establishment of a closer relationship between the United States and the League of Nations. I am convinced this is an appropriate time to consider such a resolution. It is not my purpose to ask for immediate action upon the proposal by the Congress, but I hope it will serve to clarify the issue.

In every civilized community in the world, lawlessness and violence have been supplanted by a permanent system of social cooperation. Following the war an effort was made by the great nations of the world to supplant international war by a system of cooperation. The creation of the World Court and the League of Nations was the result; but these agencies should not be regarded as fixed and unyielding forms in such a system, but rather as ideas susceptible to growth and change and adaptation to meet different national needs and situations. In the work of these mechanisms, the processes of growth and adaptation have gone on. Neither the League nor the Court has ever used military force to carry out its decisions. Each nation has determined the extent and method of cooperation.

The fear that the United States might be drawn into the quarrels of other nations, and might be called upon to send soldiers to foreign soil, has never, in the functioning of the League, been justified. It is clear that at no time would the United States have been called upon to participate in enforcement of any decisions of the League except in accordance with our own constitutional powers.

It is my suggestion, moreover, that it be made clear in the resolution that no obligation to use armed force be assumed by this country except in accordance with the Constitution of the United States.

I am thoroughly convinced that in this way, and in this way alone, can we enter the road to permanent and enduring peace.

Mr. President, I ask that the clerk read the joint resolution as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 119) providing for membership of the United States in the League of Nations was read the first time by its title and the second time at length and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 119

Joint resolution providing for membership of the United States in the League of Nations

Whereas the United States is dedicated to the policy of the good neighbor, that is to say, to the mutual respect of the rights and obligations of nations; and

Whereas in the Pact of Paris the United States and 62 other nations solemnly renounced war as an instrument of national policy, and have also made it a binding obligation among them to resort only to pacific means for the settlement of their disputes; and

Whereas the recovery of economic prosperity can never be fully achieved without that stability of conditions which can only come through international peace and security; and

Whereas it is to the manifest advantage of the United States to cooperate with other nations to this end; and

Whereas the League of Nations, with 59 states as members, is an instrument for the creation of world-wide economic stability, a permanent agency for mediation, the living symbol of the will to peace, and the only common meeting ground for the nations of the world; and

Whereas the League of Nations has in the course of its history established the principle that its members assume no obligations to aid in the enforcement of peace without the consent of their respective governments, acting in accordance with their own constitutional methods and with due regard to their traditional policies and geographical situation; and

Whereas it is therefore apparent that membership in the League of Nations upon these understood and agreed conditions would be consonant with and in furtherance of the vital interests of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the President is hereby authorized to notify the appropriate authority of the League of Nations that the United States accepts its membership in the League of Nations on the following terms and understandings:

(1) That the obligations of the Pact of Paris not to resort to war as an instrument of national policy is recognized as the fundamental and guiding principle of the Covenant; and

(2) That the provisions of the Covenant of the League of Nations relating to cooperation in the prevention of war shall not be interpreted as obligating the United States to adopt measures which might involve the use of armed force; and that the decision as to what action shall be taken by the United States in case the peace of nations is threatened or violated shall rest with the Government of the United States acting according to the Constitution.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, in asking us again, at this particular time, to go into the futile League of Nations—which, during the past few weeks, has demonstrated that it is no more than the mere instrument or tool of certain great powers—the query was asked how we could keep out of war.

Mr. President, we can keep out of war by minding our own business, and by precluding the possibility of America being propagandized into Europe.

PROHIBITION OF EXPORT OF ARMS AND AMMUNITION

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Nye] and myself, I introduce a joint resolution on the subject of prohibiting the export of arms and ammunition, and to regulate the trade in contraband of war under certain conditions.

If I may be permitted to say so, Mr. President, this joint resolution, taken in conjunction with Senate Joint Resolution 99 and Senate Joint Resolution 100, heretofore submitted by the Senator from North Dakota and myself, is designed to form a complete plan for American neutrality in the event of war.

I desire to give notice that at an early date the Senator from North Dakota and myself both desire to address the Senate at length on those resolutions.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was unable to follow the Senator as to the exact purport of this joint resolution. Is it a resolution relating to the policy of neutrality?

Mr. CLARK. It is.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator from California that I submitted the resolution for appropriate reference. It was my thought, of course, that it should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as the two companion resolutions were referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and referred as indicated by the Senator from Missouri.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 120) to prohibit the export of arms and ammunition and to regulate trade in contraband of war under certain conditions was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT TO THE BANKING BILL

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1715) to provide for the sound, effective, and uninterrupted operation of the banking system, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6732) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BYRD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6732) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6732) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK—AMENDMENT

Mr. McCARRAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2228) to provide for the further development of cooperative agricultural extension work and the more complete endowment and support of land-grant colleges and agricultural experiment stations, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FARMERS' HOME CORPORATION—AMENDMENT

Mr. SHIPSTEAD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2367) to create the Farmers' Home Corporation, to promote more secure occupancy of farms and farm homes, to correct the economic instability resulting from some present forms of farm tenancy, to engage in rural rehabilitation, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD—AMENDMENT

Mr. ROBINSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1958) to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PUBLICITY ACTIVITIES OF GOVERNMENTAL AGENCIES

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution which I ask to have read, and I ask that I be permitted to make a few remarks with reference thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 131) was read as follows:

Whereas there is a specific restriction in the law prohibiting printing of any material in any form without direct authorization of law; and

Whereas various departments of the Government and various emergency bureaus are publishing miscellaneous and promiscuous reports; and

Whereas some emergency bureaus are publishing pamphlets and newspapers, both in multigraph and printed form; and

Whereas the expense, both for personnel employed and the cost of printing, is a large item; and

Whereas various bureaus of the Government, at the expense of the taxpayer, are having prepared and presenting to the public motion pictures and displays; and

Whereas various bureaus of the Government are setting up information booths inviting the public to go into debt in remodeling their homes; and

Whereas, either directly or indirectly, radio information is given to the public setting forth the benefits of remodeling homes and suggesting that the Government will loan the money therefor: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make an investigation with a view to determining (1) the authority under which such information is being printed and disseminated; (2) the cost incident to such printing and dissemination, including personnel, motion-picture production, multigraphing, and distribution costs; and (3) all expenditures made since March 4, 1933, by any executive department, independent commission, board, bureau, office, agency, or other establishment of the Government incident to such printing and dissemination. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the result of its investigation, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpoena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $25,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Subsequently Senate Resolution 131, submitted by Mr. DICKINSON, was ordered to lie over under the rule.

EXPERIMENTAL FARM AT BELTSVILLE, MD.—E. W. SHEETS

Mr. ROBINSON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is called for. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 126) submitted by Mr. CAREY on May 3, 1935, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the cost of the construction, development, and expansion of the experimental farm of the Department of Agriculture at Beltsville, Md., and to investigate the circumstances connected with the demotion or dismissal of E. W. Sheets, formerly head of the Division of Animal Husbandry of the Bureau of Animal Industry in the Department of Agriculture, with a view to determining the connection, if any, between such demotion or dismissal and the construction, development, and expansion of said experimental farm. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the result of its investigations, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpoena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $1,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] whether he will not be willing to let the resolution be passed over for the present until I can confer with him?

Mr. CAREY. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, before that action is taken, I desire to make a statement. The resolution which I have just presented—

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas calls for the regular order.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, the question whether the resolution of the Senator from Wyoming shall go over is debatable.

Mr. ROBINSON. I asked that the resolution go over.

Mr. DICKINSON. That is debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that the Senator from Wyoming, at the request of the Senator from Arkansas, indicated his willingness to let the resolution go over.

Mr. DICKINSON. The Senator from Wyoming cannot control the other Members of the Senate, and the question is open to debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I shall move that the resolution of the Senator from Iowa be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, that is exactly what I had expected to ask. There is no intention on my part to try to force a hearing on the resolution at this time. I do not know why the Senator from Arkansas should assume the attitude he does. I am perfectly willing that the resolution shall go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. There was a unanimous-consent agreement that immediately upon the conclusion of the morning business the Senate should proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business. There is a reason for desiring that the unfinished business be disposed of not later than sometime tomorrow. A number of Senators desire to attend the ceremonies in connection with the funeral of the late Senator CUTTING, but they do not desire to be absent while the unfinished business is being considered. So I felt that it was my duty to insist on the regular order and ask that the Senator defer discussion of his resolution until another time. Of course, I realize that ample opportunity will be afforded for discussion of the resolution.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the resolution was offered during the morning hour, when routine business was being transacted. It is no part of the calendar; it was quite in observance of the unanimous-consent agreement. The Senator had the right to submit his resolution during the morning hour.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not object to the submission of the resolution; it is the consideration of the resolution to which I am addressing myself.

Mr. McNARY. What the Senator from Iowa wanted was to have the resolution read and then referred to the Committee on Appropriations, after which it would go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; the Senator has had the resolution read and indicated that he wished to address the Senate on the subject matter of the resolution, and I suggest that the resolution go over under the rule.

Mr. McNARY. The demand for the regular order would not apply. The Senator from Iowa was entitled to have his resolution read and properly referred.

Mr. ROBINSON. It has been read.

Mr. McNARY. The demand of the Senator from Arkansas for the regular order was not in order at all.

Mr. ROBINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. DICKINSON. If the Senator's desire is to save time by adopting these tactics, he is not informed as to my purpose. I expect to take only a few moments. I do not intend to make a long speech.

Mr. ROBINSON. After the statement I have made, if the Senator insists, for the present I withdraw the request that Senate Resolution 131 go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On request of the Senator from Arkansas, Senate Resolution 126 will be passed over.

PUBLICITY ACTIVITIES OF GOVERNMENTAL AGENCIES

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I expect to take only a few moments. Senate Resolution 131, submitted by me, will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which is the usual place of the reference for such a resolution, under the regular order. I desire to make a brief statement with reference to the purport of the resolution.

On March 29 the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] had printed in the Record the law with reference to printing and publicity by different bureaus, and the personnel to be employed thereby. It is found in title 5 of the United States Code, annotated, in the following paragraph, on page 50.

Publicity experts not to be employed without specific appropriation: No money appropriated by any act shall be used for the compensation of any publicity expert unless specifically appropriated for that purpose.

I find that now there are being published in the various bureaus of the Government real newspapers. I cite, for example, the Blue Eagle, published weekly. The issue I hold in my hand is dated April 5. It is an eight-page publication. There is no authorization for any publication of this kind in the N. R. A. law. This publication is comparable to a weekly newspaper printed in any town of 5,000 inhabitants. It purports to give the various codes; it purports to give interpretations; it purports to give information as to the progress being made. Maps similar to those published in the Nation's Business are shown. Administrative orders are set out.

Then we find this on the back page:

Recent Trends in Silk Textiles.

There are various charts showing the trend of prices, workmen's compensation, and so forth. I know of nothing in the N. R. A. which would permit the publication of such a document.

The next publication to which I desire to call attention is one issued under the Federal Housing Administration. Here is a publication of eight pages, with pictures on the back page. There is an article entitled "The Number of Marriages in Chicago Compared with the Number of New Houses and Apartments Constructed."

I find another heading reading, "Huntington, W. Va., Modernized."

This is direct political propaganda for the Housing Administration.

I am told that, in addition to the publication of this weekly newspaper, they have publicity booths. They had one in the Hecht Co.'s store here in Washington, over which there was a big sign, "Make application for a mortgage on your home."

According to the old philosophy of our forefathers, to mortgage the home is the first step toward dispossession. Yet we find our Government definitely engaged in propaganda in an effort to induce people to put mortgages on their homes, a Government bureau putting out this type of publication in order to advance such a purpose.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Has the Senator a resolution of some kind pending providing for an investigation of propaganda?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes; the resolution was read and will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLACK. I should like to suggest to the Senator that I think it is well to consider the idea of investigating propaganda, but it would seem to me—and I wanted to ask the Senator whether he would object to the idea I have in mind—that it would be wholly inappropriate to limit the investigation within such a narrow scope. If we are to have an investigation of propaganda, why not provide an adequate appropriation for an investigation by a Senate committee, not limited to the so-called "propaganda" issued by any department but to include propaganda issued by any agency of any kind in the United States, including the chamber of commerce and the power companies. For instance, this morning I received about eight letters, evidently written on the same typewriter, on the same kind of stationery, from people in different places.

I wish to state to the Senator that I am in full sympathy with the idea of having a general, broad, sweeping investigation of all types of propaganda circulated through newspapers, magazines, or other agencies, or which may be supplied to people who desire to attack or to defend any particular policy. I am wondering whether the Senator would object to such an amendment to his resolution, and would sympathize with the movement, so as to have a real, broad, sweeping investigation of all types of propaganda.

Mr. DICKINSON. It is my thought that the investigation I propose should be limited to the propaganda being disseminated at the expense of the taxpayer. This is Federal propaganda. I have no objection to a broader type of investigation. I have no objection to a special committee being appointed. I doubt whether the Appropriations Committee would be the appropriate committee. I think there should be a select committee.

Mr. BLACK. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in many instances the propaganda which is supposed to emanate from private business is being financed out of the Federal Treasury. For instance, there has been a very broad, sweeping propaganda recently with reference to the Pan American Airways. It would be very interesting to investigate and find out who is responsible for it.

I mention that simply as one illustration.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I do not care to yield further, because I do not wish to enter into that particular discussion at the present time. The majority leader has suggested that he wishes to hurry the program, and I am desirous of concluding my brief remarks.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator does not object to an amendment of that kind?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not.

Mr. BLACK. I am very pleased to have that viewpoint of the Senator. I shall draw up an amendment to the effect I have stated.

Mr. DICKINSON. The second release of the Federal Housing Administration which I find is a clip sheet giving pictures and different types of publicity which, at the suggestion of the Federal Housing Administration, various publication organizations can pick up and reprint.

Further, I find that under the A. A. A. there are numerous types of propaganda. For instance, there is "The Consumers Guide", composed of 28 pages, setting forth all the different facts which they think will satisfy the consumer with reference to the trend in prices. This pamphlet contains items headed, "Consumer Facing New Deal in Foreign Trade", "Facts for Food Faddists", and so forth.

This is all printed by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. I know of nothing in the act which permits the publication of any such document. This document happens to be no. 11 of volume 2, dated March 25, 1935.

I also find that there is printed by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration a pamphlet entitled "Information for the Press." This is printed once a week, giving out the various facts with reference to the A. A. A., the payment of benefits by States, and so forth. This is a publication which carries various tables, all printed by multigraph.

I also find that the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, under date of January 1935, through the United States Government Printing Office, printed a pamphlet entitled "Agriculture's Interest in America's World Trade." This is a finely printed pamphlet containing 22 pages. It costs considerable money. This is merely an indication of what is being put out in order to show that the Federal Government is doing something with the vast amount of money it is spending.

Another pamphlet, Achieving a Balanced Agriculture, by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, was issued in August 1934. It is a pamphlet containing 52 pages, printed by the Government Printing Office at Government expense.

Another pamphlet is entitled "Economic Bases for the Agricultural Adjustment Act."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. Some minutes ago I withdrew the objection to the discussion by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] on the statement by him that he was going to consume only 2 or 3 minutes. He has been speaking now for something like 15 minutes. I suggest to the Senator that he conclude his remarks, or I shall be compelled to make a point of order against the discussion.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I have almost concluded. I do not take very much time on the Senate floor, but I shall take a good deal more time today than I had expected to take if the interruption continues.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am becoming tired of that sort of threat. I suggested the reason why I was anxious to proceed with the unfinished business. Unanimous consent was given to do that at the conclusion of the routine morning business. I think under the circumstances the Senator should respect that understanding, and not insist upon discussing an entirely irrelevant matter which is not before the Senate.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I have only a very limited amount of material here, and I expect to conclude very shortly with reference to the various documents I have before me.

Others of them are as follows:

Economic Bases for the Agricultural Adjustment Act, 67 pages, printed by the Government Printing Office under the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

Maintaining Corn-Hog Adjustment in 1935—various pamphlets.

Also a release by Chester Davis, being an address with a headline, Common Ground. This release is multigraphed, and consists of 12 pages.

The Federal Housing Administration issues numerous releases. I have here no. 242. All of them have to do with the various projects upon which they are working.

I find one relating to Clarendon, Va., wherein it is said that the Government is simply guaranteeing the first mortgage, which is going to be held by the New York Life Insurance Co.; therefore, the project can go ahead by reason of the fact that they have the security which the Government guarantees the bonds, both as to principal and as to interest, to that company.

In conclusion, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD the data I now present, covering the law of public printing and documents. This is a short statement of the law covering this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From U. S. Code, title 44. Public Printing and Documents]

SEC. 111. Government printing to be done at Government Printing Office; Supreme Court excepted: All printing, binding, and blankbook work for Congress, the Executive Office, the judiciary, and every executive department, independent office, and establishment of the Government shall be done at the Government Printing Office, except such classes of work as shall be deemed by the Joint Committee on Printing to be urgent or necessary to have done elsewhere than in the District of Columbia for the exclusive use of any field service outside of said District. The printing and binding for the Supreme Court shall be done by the printer it may employ, unless it shall otherwise order.

SEC. 111a. Same; further exception: Such printing, binding, and blankbook work authorized by law, as the Public Printer is not able or equipped to do at the Government Printing Office, may be produced elsewhere under contracts made by him with the approval of the Joint Committee on Printing.

SEC. 116. No printing and binding unless authorized; binding materials: No printing or binding shall be done at the Government Printing Office unless authorized by law. Binding for the departments of the Government shall be done in plain sheep or cloth, except that record and account books may be bound in Russia leather, sheep fleshers, and skivers, when authorized by the head of a department: Provided, The libraries of the several departments, the Library of Congress, the libraries of the Surgeon General's Office, the Patent Office, and the Naval Observatory may have books for the exclusive use of said libraries bound in half Turkey, or material no more expensive.

SEC. 117. When any department, the Supreme Court, the Court of Claims, or the Library of Congress shall require printing or binding to be done, it shall be on certificate that such work be necessary for the public service; * * *

SEC. 213. No printing shall be done for the executive departments in any fiscal year in excess of the amount of the appropriation, and none shall be done without special requisition, signed by the chief of the department and filed with the Public Printer.

Heads of executive departments shall direct whether reports made to them by bureau chiefs and chiefs of divisions shall be printed or not.

SEC. 219. No book or document not having to do with the ordinary business transactions of the executive departments shall be printed on the requisition of any executive department or unless the same shall have been expressly authorized by Congress.

SEC. 220. The head of any executive department, independent office, or establishment of the Government is authorized, with the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to use from the appropriations available for printing and binding such sums as may be necessary for the printing of journals, magazines, periodicals, and similar publications as he shall certify in writing to be necessary in the transaction of the public business required by law of such department, office, or establishment. There may be printed, in addition to those necessary for such public business, not to exceed 2,000 copies for free distribution by the department, office, or establishment issuing the same.

Mr. DICKINSON subsequently said: Mr. President, following what I had to say earlier in the day about propaganda, I desire to make a brief reference to a new book which has been published, called "Handout", by an author by the pen name of George Michael.

I find this book reviewed in the New York Times of date of May 6, 1935, by John Chamberlain. In the review he says:

Handout is a discussion of the allegedly nefarious propaganda activities of the Roosevelt government. It attempts to establish the following—

I do not care to insert all the review. I shall merely make one or two references to it.

Under paragraph 9 the review says:

9. That the A. A. A. maintains a veritable man mountain of a propaganda staff.

10. That the various Government agencies are loaded down with excellent newspaper men who have been lured away from their old employ by higher salaries. Mr. Michael also objects to the practice of editors who accept "administration stuff" from journalists on the Government pay roll without explaining in footnotes that the authors in question are not free lances but masked new-deal employees.

The end of the review I quote as follows:

One hopes that it will have extremely wide publicity, that it will remove the new deal from the status of sacred cow in some quarters, and that journalism will not fail to take its tip and kick loud and long at the Democrats whenever it feels like it. Conservatives and radicals alike should be interested in the allegations of "George Michael."

I have just sketched the book. I find that it starts out as follows:

Is there a system of censorship conducted by the present administration at Washington for the purpose of suppressing vital facts? Is there an organized attempt to prevent the public from learning what is being done? What is actually going on?

Then I find reference to the visit of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the State of Iowa, where he spoke in Des Moines, and where the newspaper reports said that he was given a "tongue lashing" by Ferdinand Pecora.

I find that this book states that the two men did not appear on the same platform; that there was no "tongue lashing" at all; that Mr. Pecora made his usual speech before the chamber of commerce, and that the Senator from South Carolina spoke at the fair grounds; that the only time they appeared together was when the Senator from South Carolina was simply introduced before the chamber of commerce.

I also find that the book refers to what is known as war-time propaganda, and on that subject it says:

The administration in power deliberately built up the greatest system of propaganda ever witnessed in the world to that date, a system designed to control the issuance of all information to the public, a system which authorized only those facts that aided in maintaining the confidence of the public in the administration.

I also find that there is a reference here to who administered that program, and who were the assistants; and it makes very good reading.

The book refers to travel expense in this language:

Has a "new dealer" appeared on the lecture platform in your community? If one hasn't, then you live off the path of comfortable travel. Otherwise, one of them, traveling at your expense, has appeared before you and "outlined and explained" just what the administration is doing and is planning to do for your benefit.

Then I find in the book, with reference to publicity, this quotation:

In the Official Register of Government Who's Who, the Federal Housing Administration lists 29 persons engaged in publicity and public relations work. These 29 are costing the taxpayers more than $127,000 a year in salaries alone. Nor are any of the small fry listed in the Official Register.

This book gives an explanation of some of the things that are being done, and for that reason I think it supports my suggestion for an investigation. I hope in due time the Appropriations Committee can take up the resolution for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate Resolution 131 will lie over under the rule.

REPORT OF BUSINESS ADVISORY COUNCIL

Mr. STEIWER. I submit a resolution which I ask to have read and go over under the rule.

The resolution (S. Res. 132) was read and ordered to lie over under the rule, as follows:

Resolved, That the President is respectfully requested to transmit to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the complete report recently filed with him by the Business Advisory Council appointed by the Secretary of Commerce.

REPORT OF RELIEF ADMINISTRATOR HOPKINS (S. DOC. NO. 56)

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, from the Committee on Appropriations I present a report pursuant to Senate resolution 115, the report being from Relief Administrator Hopkins. I ask that it may be printed, with illustrations, as a Senate document in order that the Senate may be advised of its contents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

GOVERNMENT BY LAW OR BY MEN—ADDRESS BY SENATOR SCHALL

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by me on Monday, April 29.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow citizens, I am grateful to the National Broadcasting Co. for the privilege of asking here one question, the fundamental question of our existence as a Republic, the foremost problem that has faced the civilizations of 30 centuries—only one question:

Have we in the United States today a "government of laws", as presumed by the courts of the land since the days of Washington and Jefferson, or, on the other hand, a "government of men", as held by Professor Tugwell, the reputed "brain truster" no. 1 of the new deal?

That is the foremost question that has confronted mankind in all the struggles of 30 centuries in the history of liberty since the days of the early Greek Republic.

For 146 years—from the drafting of our great organic law, which begins with the words "We, the people of the United States", down to the year 1933—that question was never raised except once, when Fort Sumter was fired upon in 1860. We have always assumed we had "government by law."

But on November 16, 1933, only a little over a year ago, that question was raised again, and "government of laws" was declared a "fiction." And this statement was made and published by an official spokesman of the present administration, printed by the Government Printing Office, and distributed under the frank as a public document.

Rexford Guy Tugwell, Under Secretary of Agriculture—an official of such standing in the administration that he attends the Cabinet meetings at the White House—declared in a public address delivered at Columbia University, November 16, 1933 (see p. 19):

"I have had a chance to see the truth of the saying that ours is a government of men. The fiction that it is a government of laws would, I think, never have attained its great prestige if the right men had been called to govern."

What Tugwell had had a "chance to see" during the 5 months preceding this address were things like these:

Brigadier General Johnson with his brass band marching down the streets, pasting Blue Eagles over the store fronts and barber shops of a million towns, "cracking down" all industry and trade, interstate and local, imposing 731 codes to legalize monopoly under suspension of the antitrust laws, boosting the living costs of every family and wage earner, and jailing an old tailor for charging 5 cents less than the code price for cleaning a suit of clothes.

Tugwell had "a chance to see" with approval this:

The Bureau, called A. A. A., levying billions in processing taxes upon every food and textile product in the country—though article I of the Constitution grants the sole taxing power to Congress under the American rule of law that "taxation goes with representation."

Tugwell had a "chance to see" cotton processing taxes under the A. A. A., and legalized monopoly under the N. R. A., close hundreds of mills, North and South, because poor families who chiefly use cotton goods and workmen who wear denim overalls could not afford the boosted prices forced upon them by a "government of men" enthroned upon the ruins of "government by laws."

Tugwell had a chance to see the tax power, described by Chief Justice John Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland, as "the power to destroy", taken from Congress, the legislative body to whom the people had intrusted it, and bestowed upon the bureaucrats of "government of men."

He had a chance to see the tariff-making function, one of the chief attributes of the tax power, taken from Congress, where under the Constitution it had resided since the first tariff laws of Hamilton and Jefferson, and bestowed upon an executive star chamber before which no American producer or consumer, workman, or taxpayer can be heard in his plea for protection.

Tugwell had had a chance to see States reduced to the status of colonial Provinces without power to regulate their local industries, mines, mills, hotels, or even pigpens.

He had a chance to see 120,000,000 acres of cotton plowed under, 6,000,000 hogs destroyed by a "government of men" at a time when 11,000,000 unemployed needed overalls and meat.

Tugwell had a chance to see a press code, a Communications Act, and 20 codes of the N. R. A. relating to press machines and printing materials invoked by a "government of men" for Federal control of freedom of the press.

He had a chance to see 77 instances where the legislative function of the Government had been transferred to the Executive, and he had seen 151 new crimes created by industrial codes without the consent of Congress.

Therefore, Professor Tugwell, "brain truster" no. 1 of the new deal, imported from "over there", continued his address as follows:

"In fact, a careful examination of the new legislation will disclose that its novel characteristic is its provision for freedom of action by those who have to do the acting. The powers granted are mostly permissive; the rules written are mandates for performance. Everything depends on men."

Comrade Tugwell had been a student at Moscow, where "everything depends on men"—the commissars of the Soviet general council—and he came back a "collectivist", a believer in complete socialization of all industrial and civic enterprises under a centralized "government of men."

Over there he had a chance to see all legislative powers surrendered to the executive under "permissive" grants—as in Moscow, Berlin, and Rome.

He had a chance to see all constitutions and bills of rights abolished and the edicts and codes of commissars, an il duce, and a chancellor substituted.

He had a chance to see freedom of the press set aside by a federally controlled press for the propagation of "government by men."

He had a chance to see States and cities, farms and factories, reduced to imperial subjects by a centralized "government of men."

Therefore he was proud to be the first to proclaim that "government of laws is a fiction", even in the United States, and that we now have a new deal which a careful examination will disclose has this "novel characteristic", namely, "freedom of action by those who have to do the acting"—which being interpreted means without interference by the Constitution, the Bill of Rights, the Congress elected by the people, or the people themselves, the subjects thereof.

There is only one authoritative answer to the question here raised, namely: Have we "government by laws" or "government by men"? That answer can be delivered effectually only by the 40,000,000 voters of this Republic at the polls. That is the issue of today and the issue of 1936 and of every national election until this question is settled—and it never will be settled until it is settled right.

In conclusion. We have had 2 years of this "government of men" as a substitute for "government of laws." What have we now?

Two years of mountainous debt, deficits, and doles, aggregating $20,000,000,000 that must be paid by the workers of this and the next generation.

Mills closed, North and South, 12,000,000 unemployed; 22,000,000, or one-fifth, of the population on public doles, and the food production of the country cut down 40 percent—while a flood of foreign imports is taking our home markets and closing our industries, even as the flood of foreign heresies is destroying our Americanism.

Have we not had enough? Lord Macaulay said of a bureaucratic gang raiding India: "They made a desert, and called it peace."

Shall it be said by a future historian of the "raw deal": "They made a chaos, and called it national recovery?"

This administration has not wanted recovery, it has wanted chaos, for only through such created chaotic condition would it have secured its government of men so secretly substituted without knowledge of the people for the government of laws which for 150 years has made our country the most prosperous, the most progressive, the most democratic nation in the world.

Let me ask you, my radio audience, if we do not owe our country this duty, to wit: To deport as early as may be the entire pack of "brain trusters" and their alphabetical quack nostrums, with all their Blue Eagles, on the flagship Nourmahal bound for Moscow, that we may once again get down to the real business of life, restore our industries, our freedom, our Constitution and flag over a truly recovered America of government by laws on a basis of common sense and common honesty?

LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT IN BEHALF OF TOM MOONEY

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, 19 years ago Tom Mooney was convicted on perjured testimony and sentenced to die. Sentence was later commuted to life imprisonment and release on parole offered, but rejected. Knowing himself to be innocent, Tom Mooney refuses to accept anything but an unconditional pardon. Efforts are being made to interest the President of the United States in his behalf, and I ask leave to insert in the RECORD a letter addressed to the President on April 30.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE TOM MOONEY DEFENSE COMMITTEE OF WASHINGTON, D. C.,
Washington, D. C., April 30, 1935.
President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT: So that you may have particularly in mind on labor's day of hope, May 1, the tragic case of one of labor's leaders, Tom Mooney, we respectfully call your attention to the letters which have been addressed to you on this case by more than a score of United States Senators and Congressmen, during the past 2 months. These letters, representing all sections of the country, recognize the legal limitations imposed upon your office in the matter, but express the earnest hope that you will find some way, immediately, of helping to effect the release and vindication of Tom Mooney, who will have spent 19 years in prison this coming July as the victim of one of the most glaring frame-ups in American history.

A composite of these letters delivered at the White House, would read approximately as follows: "Reluctant as we are to add to your burdens, we, the undersigned Members of the Seventy-fourth Congress, believe it our duty to aid in directing your attention to the case of Tom Mooney."

"Beyond question, this man was convicted on perjured testimony, and would not, and could not, have been convicted except for that testimony. His continued imprisonment is really a disgrace to all of us."

"While we know that in this case you have not the pardoning power, still may we respectfully suggest that you take whatever action is possible to put an end to the continuing injustice of Mooney's imprisonment."

The list of Members of Congress who have sent letters to you or otherwise made known their deep concern about the case within recent weeks includes the following: Senator GERALD P. NYE, of North Dakota; Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL, of Minnesota; Senator JAMES P. POPE, of Idaho; Senator BENNETT CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri; Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER, of New York; Senator N. N. NEELY, of West Virginia; Senator RUSH D. HOLT, of West Virginia; Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin; Senator EDWARD P. COSTIGAN, of Colorado; Senator HOMER T. BONE, of Washington; Senator HENRIK SHIPSTEAD, of Minnesota; Senator BRONSON M. CUTTING, of New Mexico; Senator LEWIS W. SCHWELLENBACH, of Washington; Congresswoman CAROLINE O'DAY, of New York; Congressman ERNEST LUNDEEN, of Minnesota; Congressman FRED H. HILDEBRANDT, of South Dakota; Congressman JOHN H. HOEPEL, of California; Congressman FRED SISSON, of New York; Delegate ANTHONY DIMOND, of Alaska; Congressman JAMES H. GILDEA, of Pennsylvania; Congressman THOMAS O'MALLEY, of Wisconsin; Congressman H. P. KOPPELMANN, of Connecticut; Congressman GEORGE J. SCHNEIDER, of Wisconsin; Congressman MAURY MAVERICK, of Texas; Congressman MATTHEW A. DUNN, of Pennsylvania; Congressman JOHN J. COCHRAN, of Missouri; Congressman BERNARD J. GEHRMANN, of Wisconsin; Congressman MARTIN L. SWEENEY, of Ohio; Congressman MERLIN HULL, of Wisconsin; Congressman VIRO MARC-ANTONIO, of New York; Congressman THOMAS R. AMLIE, of Wisconsin.

The list is growing daily. There seems to be a renewal of hope that you will use your great influence to hasten the ending of this bitterly unjust imprisonment. Though counsel for Mooney are assiduously pressing his cause in the courts—doing so with inspiring self-sacrifice—the delays are bound to be long. Even if the Governor of California should respond favorably to the recent vote of the California assembly calling for the commutation of sentence of Mooney we are informed by him that he will not accept it. He naturally insists upon a complete vindication or nothing.

So we respectfully call upon you to heed the voice of justice-loving people everywhere which is symbolized by the congressional letters pouring into your office.

Yours sincerely,

TOM MOONEY DEFENSE COMMITTEE OF WASHINGTON, D. C.
JOHN W. JENKINS, Chairman.
GARDNER JACKSON, Secretary.

IMPROVEMENT OF BUSINESS CONDITIONS

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a clipping from the Washington Sunday Star of May 5, 1935, entitled "Quarter's Net of 200 Companies Gains 28 Percent Over 1934 Period."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

QUARTER'S NET OF 200 COMPANIES GAINS 28 PERCENT OVER 1934 PERIOD—LEADING CORPORATIONS MAKING RAPID STRIDES TOWARD 1929 PROFIT LEVEL, SAYS BUSINESS WEEK; MACHINERY AN OUTSTANDING FEATURE

NEW YORK, May 4.—Despite the fact that some quarters are still talking about "prospective" recovery instead of acknowledging the progress already made, most leading industrial companies are taking rapid strides toward the 1929 profits level, says Business Week today. "A few have already attained or passed that goal", it continues. "Examples are Eaton Manufacturing, catering to the motor industry; Air Reduction in the chemical field; American Chiclé, profiting by the gum-chewing proclivities of the American public; National Distillers, for obvious reasons."

"Business Week has tabulated some 200 companies whose first-quarter earnings have been made available. As a group, these concerns forged more than 28 percent ahead of the first quarter of 1934. Extraordinary gains characterize the earnings reports of construction-material makers, machinery manufacturers (778 percent), electrical-equipment producers (203 percent), publishing and printing firms (126 percent); also those of companies in the steel and iron, metal products, nonferrous mining, and railway-equipment industries. The food industry did less well in the first 3 months of 1935 than in the same period of 1934, despite the fact that food prices are higher this year than last. The drug list and the limited sample of retail trade included have failed thus far to show up as well as in 1934."

HOME BUILDING ACTIVE

"Improvement in residential construction and the boost given to modernization and renovation obviously lie behind the rise in the returns of construction-material makers. Johns-Manville made the first profit for the quarter since 1931. Gains in the machinery- and electrical-equipment group indicate that even the heavy industries are beginning to feel the expanding volume of business purchases. Link-Belt earnings are up 70 percent; Allis-Chalmers had the smallest loss for any quarter of the current depression; United States Hoffman Machinery (garment pressers) found earnings jumped 76 percent as the clothing industry stepped up operations. Caterpillar Tractor sales and profits both rose about 38 percent. Westinghouse first quarter profits were more than 10 times the earnings for the whole year 1934. General Electric sales and earnings this year are the largest for the period since 1931."

"In the steel industry the hand of the durable goods buyer is also clearly apparent. Automobile production of predepression volume is a major factor, but farm implement, refrigerator, and other consumers have been well down in front among buyers. United States Steel cut its loss from over $6,900,000 to less than $2,200,000. Other large producers are still in the red, but less so than a year ago. Some, like National Steel, report increased profits of 105 percent, making the first 3 months of 1935 the best quarter of any year since 1929. Inland Steel profits are up 123 percent; Midland Steel, 386 percent."

MOTORS SET PACE

"The motor industry, whose fearlessness set the pace for first-quarter manufacturing activity, dominates the Business Week list, though only six companies are included. General Motors had the largest first-quarter since 1930, with sales up 20 percent. Even the smaller companies whose markets have been squeezed by the big three are doing creditably—witness Auburn, whose loss was cut in half; Reo, which made the first profit for the period since 1929; Graham Paige, whose profits leaped 695 percent; Packard, whose loss was reduced."

"Such activity in the motor industry was pie for the parts and accessories producers; 22 out of 23 companies operated in the black, both in 1934 and 1935. Most of them more than doubled last year's first-quarter earnings. Eaton Manufacturing made a 29-percent jump on the first-quarter 1929 earnings. Houdaille-Hershey nearly reached the earnings total of all 1934 in the first 3 months of 1935. Thompson Products has already exceeded the earnings of the whole year 1930."

"Competition, strikes, and termination of unusual profits in liquor sales lowered earnings in the food lines. Restaurants, Spiegel, May, Stern, and McLellan earnings tipped the retail record into the red. Among the miscellaneous group are concealed such extraordinary gains as that of Douglas Aircraft, whose profits were nearly equal to those for the whole of 1929 and almost 10 times all of 1934's."

THE ST. VITUS' DANCE GOVERNMENT—ADDRESS BY SENATOR LONG

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have a radio address printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the speech?

Mr. LONG. A speech I made over the radio.

Mr. ROBINSON. A speech the Senator himself made?

Mr. LONG. Yes; a mighty good speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. It could not be a good speech if the Senator made it. [Laughter.] I shall not object to the request.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Radio address by Hon. HUEY LONG, of Louisiana, May 2, 1935

Ladies and gentlemen: Whether you do or do not believe in the divine rule of the Scriptures, or in the precepts of the founders of this country, or in history, or philosophy, if you will believe the four tables of arithmetic—those of addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division—you will agree with me that the wealth of this land must be immediately redistributed among our 125,000,000 people if America is to be saved.

For a moment, ladies and gentlemen, let me turn to the last radio address delivered by our President, the Honorable Franklin Delano Roosevelt. It was delivered to the people of our country on last Sunday night.

Now the President says that the people cannot understand just how good he has got them coming along. Here are his words:

"The job of creating a program for the Nation's welfare is, in some respects, like the building of a ship. At different points on the coast where I often visit they build great sea-going ships."

You see what the President is talking about there, is that, when he goes out on that $5,000,000 yacht they call the Nourmahal, owned by brother Vincent Astor, who does lots of ship-subsidy business with the United States, where they get as much as $1,000 for carrying one 3-cent letter, he sometimes sees them building ships. Now let us quote him further:

"When one of these ships is under construction and the steel frames have been set in the keel, it is difficult for a person who does not know ships to tell how it will finally look when it is sailing the high seas. * * * It is that way with the making of a national policy."

Oh, so we see now, our President of the United States, the "Knight of the Nourmahal", says we are confused because we cannot see just how this thing is going to look when he gets through making it. Why to be sure! All those millions of hogs they killed; all those cattle they shot down; the milk they poured into the rivers with the people starving for it; all of the cotton they plowed under and wool that they burned up, with the people naked because they could not get it; none of us can see just how that is working out. But the President says it is going to look pretty when he gets the picture made up. Surely it will look pretty. It may not look exactly like a song, but it will be something like a dance—the St. Vitus' dance.

Now, the President said this:

"They know that the process of the constructive rebuilding of America cannot be done in a day or a year."

No; and if he is a fair sample of it, they know it cannot be done in 100 years. His process of construction, if you call it construction, is to start out repairing the automobile by first tearing off the top and then when the rain begins to beat in, to hammer the engine to pieces, tear down the chassis, and then wind up by taking off the wheels. That leaves only one thing to do—he sends the bill for the work. That bill has now reached the size of over $30,000,000,000, six times more than all of the money in circulation in the United States.

But now we are getting to something. The President takes us into his confidence. Here is what he says next:

"The most difficult place in the world to get a clear and open perspective of the country as a whole is in Washington. * * * That is why I occasionally leave this scene of action for a few days to go fishing."

Now if you will observe closely, our President remarks that he could not find out about the people of the country in Washington, so he betook himself on board the $5,000,000 yacht called the Nourmahal, owned by Vincent Astor, where he was dead certain to find out just how things were getting along. This Nourmahal yacht sailed out into the British waters with the President on board and soon thereafter was boarded by the son and daughter-in-law of the King of England, the Duke and Duchess of Kent, and now after some several days or weeks tour on the briny English waters, enthroned on a $5,000,000 yacht, in company with the multimillionaire Astor and the Duke and Duchess of Kent right out of England, our great and benevolent President returns and says he went on this fishing trip to find out what it is all about.

This will be great comfort to the cotton hands who are not allowed to plant cotton this year. It will do a great deal of help among the starving who are told they must make contracts to reduce the quantity of foodstuffs so there will not be too much. Hooray for the President's fishing trip! Let's send him off again.

If he doesn't get any better understanding of conditions in this country than he has had in the last 2 years, it would be a fine thing if Congress made a contract with Mr. Vincent Astor and his $5,000,000 yacht, not only to take the President out in the British waters to fish for a few weeks, but to keep him there for several more months and trust to luck the country would find its way back to normalcy.

I didn't get to hear the message of the President as it was delivered over the radio, because I was on board a train returning from Des Moines, where I had made a speech. But I will say to you that at that place I took a vote of the crowd—some 20,000 highly educated and intelligent people—and without one exception every hand was raised into the air favoring the plan for a redistribution of wealth and not one hand was raised against it.

But to get back to my point. Not having heard the President speak, as I returned to Washington I stepped over to my office when I was approached by an officer who said to me:

"I heard the President last night."

"What did he say?" I asked.

"He said to just keep waiting."

But the President of the United States has long since forgotten the pledge and promise which he made and on which he was nominated and elected the President of the United States. He promised in terms that were certain; in language which could not be misunderstood, that he would break up the size of the big fortunes of this country and use it to build the common people up from the ground to where they had something on which to live in comfort. He made that promise in the speech which he delivered in Atlanta, Ga., the basis on which I declared for him for President. He made that promise when he accepted the nomination of the Democratic Party at the Chicago convention. He made that promise in other speeches which he delivered during the campaign. And I was sent into State after State, directly from the then candidate for President—Mr. Roosevelt—to tell the people that when Mr. Franklin De-la-no Roosevelt became our President, that the big fortunes would be whittled down to a reasonable limit in size and that thereby the common run of mankind would be built up from the bottom, at least to the point where all our people had a home and the comforts of life for their families, with steady employment to all labor and profit over production costs to all farmers.

What I say as to these promises by our President will not be disputed by him or by anyone else. They are in indelible type; they are in letters and pamphlets that cannot be questioned.

But now, in the third year of his administration, we find more of our people unemployed than at any other time. We find our houses empty, our people hungry, many of them half clothed and many of them not clothed at all. We find not only the people going further into debt, but that the United States is going further into debt, the States are going further into debt, and the cities and towns are going even into bankruptcy. The condition has become deplorable. Instead of his promise, the only remedy that Mr. Roosevelt has prescribed is to borrow more money if we can and to go further into debt. The last move was to borrow $5,000,000,000 on which we must pay interest for the balance of our lifetime. And with it all there stalks the slimy specter of want, hunger, destitution, and pestilence, all because of the fact that in the land of too much to eat and too much to wear, our President has failed in his promise to have these necessities of life distributed into the hands of the people who have need of them.

Now the jet-black shadow of our want and misery came upon us step by step with certain precision, day after day, month after month and year after year. There were investigations and studies made both by private bodies and governmental agencies to find out the causes of our trouble. The whole matter was studied very seriously up to as late as the years 1916 to 1920. The departments of the United States Government and many of our statesmen and newspapers and other journals openly stated that our growing trouble was caused by too much of our wealth getting into the hands of too few of our people. All of them said that we had to turn things around the other way, so as to have the few people owning less and less; so as to have the masses own more and more.

But such things were said at a time before the money masters had muzzled these public journals and before they had stifled the agencies of our Government's research and publicity. Here is what the Government report rendered to Congress in 1916 by the Industrial Relations Commission said:

"The sources from which industrial unrest springs are, when stated in full detail, almost numberless. But, upon careful analysis of their real character, they will be found to group themselves almost without exception under four main sources which include all the others. These four are:

"1. Unjust distribution of wealth and income."

The United States Industrial Relations Commission said further:

"The rich, 2 percent of the people, own 60 percent of the wealth; the middle class, 33 percent of the people, own 35 percent of the wealth. The poor, 65 percent of the people, own 5 percent of the wealth. This means in brief that a little less than 2,000,000 people, who would make up a city smaller than Chicago, own 20 percent more of the Nation's wealth than all the other 90,000,000."

But at about the time these studies were being made, our country was thrown into the European war in 1917 and when the shades of 1919 were lowered on the peace conference in Paris, the billionaires and multimillionaires of our finances had begun to apply their pressure throughout America. They saw to it thereafter that nothing more was said about too few people owning too much, or about too many people owning too little. They muzzled down on everything as tight as a drum. From 1920 to 1929 they chained business and banks and roped in all of the businesses and institutions of this country four times as tight as they had ever held them. In the first year of Hoover's reign with more foodstuffs and more wearing apparel, more manufactured articles, more houses, and more of everything else than this country had ever seen in all of its history, notwithstanding all our abundance of everything for which our people had any need, there began to come about the first wave of our greatest hunger, nakedness, homelessness, and destitution in this land where there was too much of everything.

Why was that?

It was because of the fact that in spite of those conditions of too few owning too much, as we found to exist in 1916, that as a matter of fact in the 14 years time which followed from 1916 to 1930 those conditions grew to be two times as bad as they were when they were complained about in 1916. The study of the Federal Trade Commission, made in 1930, said:

"The foregoing table shows that about 1 percent of the estimated number of decedents owned about 59 percent of the estimated wealth and that more than 90 percent was owned by about 13 percent of this number."

So you will see from a comparison of these two Government reports that 1 percent of the people owned as much in 1930 as 2 percent of the people owned in 1916. So it proved that the Government was correct in 1916 when it warned that too much of the wealth in the hands of too few people was bringing on calamity; for when we reached 1930, with the condition growing from bad to worse, the whole country collapsed and misery was brought upon the population in the land that was flowing with milk and money.

From the studies which I made I charged along about the years 1932-33 on the floor of the United States Senate that 4 percent of the people owned 85 percent of the wealth and that 96 percent of our people owned less than 16 percent of the wealth. I charged that 70 percent of the people of the United States didn't own enough to pay their debts. There was considerable ridicule made against the figures which I gave. During the last month of April, of this very year, the newspaper in New York City with the largest circulation, the Daily News, announced that it would send a special representative to Washington to investigate the figures which I had given out. So it sent here a gentleman named Lowell Limpus, and in the issue of the Daily News of Monday, April 8, 1935, just 3 weeks ago, here is what that great newspaper said. I quote their words:

"Four percent own 87 percent of United States, News survey shows."

Now, that is the headline of this newspaper. I will read you from the article of this newspaper of April 8, 1935:

"The News recently suggested editorially that figures quoted in current discussions on the distribution of wealth 'ought to be proved or disapproved by an official survey.' No figures being available, the News instituted a survey of its own. The results are covered in a series of articles, of which this is the first."

Now I continue to quote from this article. Here is what they said:

"The News survey simply brings the picture up to date—or as nearly so as figures permit. It reveals the following facts:

"Less than 4 percent are getting 38.5 percent of the aggregate national income. They own and control more than 87 percent of the national wealth.

"The poor are getting poorer. The national income is steadily draining into fewer and fewer pockets. The Nation's wealth is rapidly coming under the control of a mere handful of men."

I quote further from this article in the Daily News:

"The facts were there, but they were ignored. It remained for Senator HUEY LONG and his ilk to force them to the attention of the public.

HUEY LONG OPENED BOOKS

"He adopted a technique which had never occurred to the students. Huey mounted a soap box and beat a bass drum. The public stopped to listen. The News survey reveals that he knew what he was talking about—but so did the students who preceded him."

So now, my friends, I will not take the time to read you further what this big newspaper which checked up on my figures has said, but it took the time to write an editorial, and here is what the editorial of the New York Daily News of April 11, 1935, says:

"When HUEY LONG in his share-the-wealth reply to General Johnson said that 1 percent of Americans own 59 percent of America's wealth, while 4 percent own between 85 percent and 95 percent of the wealth, we knew he was a liar. We intimated as much, and added that somebody ought to look into this question and get the true figures on American wealth distribution in order to refute this demagogue LONG.

"The News then assigned one of its most competent investigators, Lowell Limpus, to the job of digging up the figures. * * * And so Lowell Limpus went to Washington and worked for weeks in the Library of Congress and elsewhere to root up the true figures with which to confound LONG.

"The results of that research are now being published in the News. And to the consternation of many people (including ourselves when we first heard of them), the results of that research show that LONG had essentially the correct dope.

"The gist of the Limpus findings is this:

"More than 96 percent of the workers in the United States receive less than the $2,000 a year which is regarded as 'sufficient only for basic necessities.'

"According to the United States Federal Trade Commission, in 1926, 1 percent of the people dying did own 59 percent of the wealth reported; and since that time the rich have been getting richer in proportion and the poor poorer.

"When Limpus discovered that such was the picture of wealth distribution in the United States he wired the News that his data would prove very startling, and that probably his findings could not be published.

"It was decided, after some deliberation, to publish them nevertheless. That decision was made on the ground that the ostrich act of sticking our heads in the sand, blinding ourselves to facts will only do us harm in the long run. To suppress these facts might damper down some unrest for a while. But it is these facts which are causing the unrest. The eventual kick-back would be much more serious if the facts continued to be kept under cover.

"And they are ominous facts. It has happened time and again that when a nation's wealth has become concentrated in too few hands, and ways of redistributing part of it peaceably have not been worked out, ways of redistributing it by violence have been adopted in time—as in France and Russia. And as long as mass purchasing power stays down and continues to shrink, there will be overproduction of the bathtubs, cars, radios, etc., which we like to think are elements in the American standard of living."

Will the balance of the newspapers do what this newspaper has done, or will they continue to be blind and lead the balance of the blind into the mire of destruction and ruin?

But the great journalistic thought of the present day refuses to see the light. The Saturday Evening Post of this week, dated May 4, 1935, has this leading editorial, from which I quote as follows:

"FACTS ARE STUBBORN"

"Rarely does any subject receive so much attention as the Honorable HUEY LONG. There is grave discussion as to how he will affect the fortunes both of the new deal and of the Republican Party. * * * Everyone has an opinion as to whether he is a 'menace' or not; the view taken depending on many different factors. * * * The core of Senator LONG's plan is to take away from all persons such wealth as they have in excess of $1,000,000, giving them the right to choose what particular kinds of property they will keep within the maximum permitted. Of the total wealth thus appropriated, he suggests that something less than half be used to educate young people and that something over half be used to bring families having less than $5,000 of property up to that figure. * * * This country has no official figures or even accurate estimates concerning the distribution of wealth. All that can be done is to capitalize for estimate purposes the incomes reported by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and on this basis, LONG's estimate of the wealth to be shared is 14 or 15 times too high."

I have not the time to read further from this editorial. You will see that it conflicts with two reports of the Government and the recent study made by the New York Daily News, to say nothing of my own calculations; but now note that this Saturday Evening Post article says that there are no figures to show the distribution of wealth. Because of that, I now ask you to let me read to you what this very same Saturday Evening Post said in its issue of September 23, 1916. That editorial is headed "Are We Rich or Poor?" And here is what the Saturday Evening Post itself said:

"The man who studies wealth in the United States from statistics only will get nowhere with the subjects, because all the statistics afford only an inconclusive suggestion. Along one statistical line you can figure out a nation bustling with wealth; along another a bloated plutocracy comprising 1 percent of the population lordling it over a starveling horde with only a thin margin of merely well-to-do in between."

What is the matter with you, Saturday Evening Post? Here you are saying there are no figures to show any such thing as I am saying, when nearly 20 years ago, when you were allowed to be honest, you told the people that 1 percent of the people had a stranglehold on nearly everything the country had in it. Why, this magazine doesn't know that I was its scholar in 1916 and it helped to push me along in this fight, and now, after 20 years of effort, it has failed to remember what it knew way back yonder and which everybody else has begun to find out at this late date.

So now, my friends, you have heard me read how a great New York newspaper, after investigation, has declared that all I have said about the bad distribution of this Nation's wealth is true. I have been severely condemned and ridiculed, over a period of many years, for persisting in giving the people the facts regarding this bad situation. Time after time, all that I have said has been pronounced false. Now they are beginning to say that it is all too true and too sad. I join them in their statements. It is too true and too sad. But we have been about our work to correct this situation. That is why the share-our-wealth societies are forming in every nook and corner of America. They are meeting tonight. Soon there will be share-our-wealth societies for everyone to meet. They have a great work to perform. Here is what we stand for, in a nutshell:

1. We propose that every family in America shall at least own a homestead equal in value to not less than one-third the average family wealth. The average family wealth of America, at normal values, is approximately $16,000. So our first proposition means that every family will have a home and the comforts of a home up to a value of not less than $5,000.

2. We propose that no family shall own more than 300 times the average family wealth, which means that no family shall possess more than a wealth of approximately $5,000,000. And we think that is too much. The two propositions together mean that no family shall own less than one-third of the average family wealth, nor shall any family own more than 300 times the average family wealth. That is to say that none should be so poor as to have less than one-third of the average, and none should be so rich as to have more than 300 times the average.

3. We next propose that every family shall have an income equal to at least one-third of the average family income in America. If all were allowed to work, according to our statistics, there would be an average family income of from $5,000 to $10,000 per year. So, therefore, in addition to the home which every family would own and the comforts of life which every family would enjoy, every family would make not less than $2,000 to $3,000 per year upon which to live and educate their children.

4. We propose that no family shall have an income of more than 300 times the average family income. Less the income taxes, this would mean an annual income of $1,000,000 would be the maximum allowed to any one family in 1 year. The third and fourth propositions simply mean that no family should earn less than one-third the average, and no family should earn more than 300 times the average; none to make too much, none to make too little. Everyone to have the things required for life; every man a king.

5. We propose a pension to the old people. Under our proposal taxes would not be levied upon the sons and daughters, nor the working people to support their aged fathers and mothers. But on the contrary, such support as would be given for old-age pensions would be borne solely by the surplus money which the Government would rake off of the big fortunes and big inheritances.

6. We propose to care for the veterans of our wars, including the immediate cash payment of the soldiers' bonus, and last, but not least, we propose that every child in America shall have a right to education and training, not only through grammar and high school, but also through college and universities. And this education and training would be of such extent as will equip each child to battle on fair terms in the work which it is compelled to perform throughout life. We would not have it that a child could go to college or university provided his parents had the money on which to send him, but it would be the right of every child under our plan to the costs, including living expenses of college and university training, which could be done by our country at a cost considerably less than is required for the military training which has been given to the youth in the past.

My plan is that our Government should call in this surplus wealth above a few million to any one family and then distribute it out to those who have the need of the same. Some criticize that plan, but it is prescribed by the Bible. I read you the words: "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common."

"Neither was there any among them that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold."

"And laid them down the apostles' feet: and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need." (See Acts, ch. 4, verses 32-36.)

It is our purpose that every man should pursue a calling that means a living to himself and his family in peace and comfort; that the shelter and home of every family should be their own. That is as the Bible says it should be. I read you the words:

"And they shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more, but they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid" (Micah, ch. 4, verses 3 and 4).

We say that none shall be too rich and none too poor. The Bible says such is as it should be. I read you the words:

"Give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me; lest I be full and deny Thee and say, 'Who is the Lord?' or lest I be poor and steal, and take the name of my God in vain" (Proverbs, ch. 30, verses 8 and 9).

And we say if these statutes of God are observed our people shall live in peace and comfort forever. The Bible says so. I read you the words:

"If you walk in my statutes . . . ye shall eat your bread to the full and dwell in your land safely, and I will give peace in the land, and ye shall lie there and nothing should make you afraid" (Leviticus, ch. 26, verses 3 to 17).

Let no one tell you that it is difficult to redistribute the wealth of this land; it matters not how rich or great one may be, when he dies his wealth must be distributed anyway. The law of God shows how it has been done throughout time. Nothing is more sensible or better understood than the redistribution of property. The laws of God command it. It is required of all nations that live. (See Leviticus, ch. 26.) Today our Nation is cursed with an overload of debt; public and private debts aggregate $262,000,000,000. That is more than $2,000 to every person. Under the present set-up this burden of debt can never be paid. It will forever condemn our people.

The laws of our Lord command that such burden of debt must be wiped out of existence so that a people may have a fair chance in life. (See Deuteronomy, ch. 15.)

So let us be about our work. It is simple. Why lie ye here idle? There is enough for all. Let there be peace in the land. Let our children be happy.

Our fight is now on here in the United States Senate to pay the soldiers' bonus. It is a debt which is due the soldiers who fought our wars. We are fighting to keep the Patman bill, which actually pays this bonus, from being sidetracked. The bill is already past the House of Representatives. Maybe you would like to wire your United States Senator tonight to ask him to stand for the Patman bill tomorrow.

I would like to hear from any of you if you wish to concern yourself with the work that we have in hand. If you want a copy of my speech, I will send it upon request. You can write to me here in Washington, D. C., care of the United States Senate.

How wonderful, how great, how fruitful to all this great land of ours can be. We only have to eliminate useless greed, provide that none shall be too big and none too small. Beautiful America can rise to the opportunity before it. It means to us all:

Every man a king.

PRINTING OF TELEGRAMS IN THE RECORD

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have been such a confirmed and casehardened sinner with respect to printing matters in the RECORD that I am somewhat reluctant at this moment to ask that certain telegrams which I have received be printed in the RECORD; but, inasmuch as it is impossible for me to reply to all such telegrams, for the reason, among others, that I do not wish to make too severe a drain upon our contingent fund, I ask that these telegrams be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I have no intention of objecting to the request of the Senator from Arizona, but I should like to suggest that I have on my desk telegrams which I have received within the last 2 days to the number of 2,200, by actual count; and if the Senator from Arizona is going to have the telegrams received by him printed in the RECORD, and every other Member of the Senate is going to have the telegrams received by him printed in the RECORD, the RECORD will expand to unheard-of proportions. So far as I am concerned, as I have said, I do not intend to object to the request of the Senator from Arizona, but I will object to the request of any other Senator to print a lot of telegrams in the RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arizona to withdraw his request? All Senators are receiving numerous telegrams of a similar character. To have them printed in the RECORD would establish a precedent; and every other Senator would want to do the same thing. Furthermore, it would cost thousands of dollars. So I submit to the Senator, in consideration of the expense which would be involved and the precedent which would be created, if he will not withdraw his request?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I cannot be insensible to the courteous and, I think, reasonable request which has been made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. However, I think it is my duty as a Senator to let my constituents know that, at least, I received their telegrams though I cannot answer them. My private purse would not admit of my paying the tolls; my constituents would resent the action if I should send them telegrams marked "collect", and I do not feel that the contingent expense fund should be charged with the cost.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. The basis of my suggestion was that I entirely understand the situation of the Senator from Arizona. There are some of us here who cannot even send out form letters answering propaganda letters and telegrams which we receive. I received in one Sunday morning's mail 6,000 letters on the subject of the holding-company bill. Of course, I recognized that those were propaganda letters, inspired by a certain source which I well understood; but I should like to let my constituents know that their letters had been received and make an acknowledgement even by a form letter. However, the demands of the ordinary senatorial duties upon my office force are such that I was not able even to send out a form letter acknowledging these 6,000 letters and many other thousands which I received during that week.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it is very bad practice and a bad precedent to undertake to answer through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD communications which Senators receive from their constituents. I think it is worthy of consideration that practically all Senators are now receiving an almost unlimited number of communications, and none of us are able to answer them all. There are instances of thousands of telegrams being received by Senators, every one of them in identical form. I do not believe the Senator from Arizona should persist in his request, and I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. ASHURST. I shall accept the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have contemplated issuing a statement to the newspapers to the effect that I have received telegrams from practically everybody in Kentucky on some subject, and that I cannot answer them all individually. That might serve the purpose the Senator from Arizona has in mind.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I merely wish to suggest to my friend from Arizona that if he will vote for the Patman bill his constituents will be fully satisfied. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHURST. I cannot vote for the Patman bill.

Mr. President, I have no intention further to delay the proceedings of the Senate. I am able to perceive that there is much force in what Senators have said. I realize that I have not the right to expect that the door be opened to me and closed to others, and, therefore, I shall withdraw the request; but before doing so, let me say that during my official career I have taken pride in the fact that I have always personally answered all letters which have been received. That is no longer possible. I received, as doubtless other Senators do, letters by the thousand with respect to the Wheeler-Rayburn bill. Nearly all these letters use the same language; as lawyers would say, they are in haec verba; they are all, as a rule, written on the same typewriter, the same misspelling occurs and the same faulty construction of language. Now and then, of course, it is a mere mischance that the writers all happen to make the same mistakes and to use the same typewriter; but I do wish them to know, at least that I received their letters, and I adopt this method of announcing to them that they need not expect a personal reply.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed. Under the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3896) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, for controlled expansion of the currency, and to extend the time for filing applications for benefits under the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], as amended, in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I simply desire to ask that the amendment to the amendment be stated. Do I understand the question is on what is known as the "Vinson bill"?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if we are ready to vote I have no desire to say anything further; but I do wish to make the point of no quorum, so that a greater number of Senators may be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho still desire to have the amendment stated?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not. I now understand what it is. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the so-called "Vinson bill" as amended. The absence of a quorum call has been suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Clark	Johnson	Pittman
Ashurst	Connally	Keyes	Pope
Austin	Coolidge	Kling	Radcliffe
Bachman	Copeland	La Follette	Robinson
Bailey	Costigan	Lewis	Russell
Bankhead	Couzens	Logan	Schall
Barbour	Dickinson	Loneragan	Schwellenbach
Barkley	Dieterich	Long	Sheppard
Bilbo	Donahay	McAdoo	Shipstead
Black	Duffy	McCarran	Smith
Bone	Fletcher	McGill	Stelwer
Borah	Frazier	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Brown	George	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Bulkley	Gerry	Maloney	Townsend
Bulow	Gibson	Metcalf	Trammell
Burke	Guffey	Minton	Truman
Byrd	Hale	Moore	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Harrison	Murray	Van Nuys
Capper	Hastings	Neely	Wagner
Caraway	Hatch	Norris	Walsh
Carey	Hayden	Overton	White

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], who is away on Government business.

I also announce the absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], who is necessarily detained from the Senate.

I regret to announce the absence of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], caused by illness.

I ask to have this announcement remain in the RECORD for the day.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] by reason of illness.

I also announce the absence of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], who are necessarily detained.

I ask that these announcements stand on all quorum calls for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], as amended, in the nature of a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement before the vote is taken. The parliamentary situation is such that it is going to be rather confusing to know how to vote and yet properly to reflect one's attitude.

I am against the Harrison bill; against the Patman bill, and against the Vinson bill; I am against them all; but whether I am able to interpret my intentions through the roll calls will largely depend upon the statement I have now made, because, otherwise, my votes may be misunderstood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the clerk will call the roll on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], as amended, in the nature of a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRAZIER (when Mr. NYE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. NYE] is absent from the city. I am informed that he is paired on this question with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. If present, my colleague would vote in the affirmative, and I understand the Senator from Virginia would vote in the negative.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the pair between the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]; and I am authorized to state that if the Senator from North Carolina were present he would vote "yea", and the Senator from Maryland, if present, would vote "nay."

I also announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] is absent because of illness. If the Senator from Wyoming were present, he would vote "yea."

I desire further to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is detained on account of illness in his family; that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained on important departmental business; that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] is absent on an official mission for the Senate to the Virgin Islands; that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is unavoidably detained from the Senate; and that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is engaged in an important meeting of the committee. If present, the Senator from Montana would vote "yea."

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] has been called to one of the departments on business of importance to his State. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] on account of illness. If present, he would vote "yea."

I also announce the necessary absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. If present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—54

So Mr. CLARK's amendment, as amended, to the amendment reported by the committee, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the vote just had places the Vinson bill in the position formerly occupied by the so-called "Harrison bill." The Harrison bill was in the form of a committee amendment to the so-called "Patman bill." For the time being the Harrison bill has been disposed of. The issue now comes between the Vinson bill and the Patman bill.

The Vinson bill proposes to pay the full amount of the adjusted-service certificates and to pay them immediately. The bill carries an appropriation in the full amount necessary to pay the certificates. In order for the Treasury Department to secure the money with which to pay the certificates the Treasury must enter the open market and sell bonds and raise the money in that way. The Patman bill proposes to pay the certificates immediately. In that particular the two bills are identical. Both bills now before the Senate propose to pay the soldiers the amounts due them.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the able Senator from Oklahoma if I understood him correctly in a previous statement on the bill that the Vinson bill carries more in the actual amount of money for the payment of the soldiers than does the bill of which we now speak as the Patman bill?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In this particular: The Vinson bill proposes to remit all interest of every kind and character. The Patman bill proposes to remit the interest only from October 1, 1931. In other words, if the Vinson bill should pass, all interest on all money borrowed by the veterans to date would be remitted. If the Patman bill should pass, the soldiers would be required to pay interest until October 1, 1931, and from then on the interest is canceled and remitted. In that particular it is true the Vinson bill carries a slightly larger amount than the Patman bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I desire to say, if the Senator will permit me, that an accounting would have to be made under the Vinson bill on each certificate. In other words, it would be necessary to check each man's certificate and ascertain what particular amount of interest is due on that particular certificate. I understand there will be an expeditious arrangement of payment under the Patman bill, which obviates a long-time delay, as long as 6 to 8 months in some cases. The slightly larger amount involved would be somewhat in favor of the soldier.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Oklahoma. The statement verifies the statement I myself had made upon the floor. I was in doubt, in view of his later statement, whether I was correct.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I think it is true that very little money had been borrowed prior to October 1, 1931. In the event the Patman bill should pass, the bulk of the interest would be remitted and very few computations would be necessary. Should the Vinson bill pass, there would be a great number of computations, which I am advised would cause delay of at least a few months in making payment to the veterans. The provisions of the Patman bill could be put in operation immediately.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator was pointing out that under the Vinson bill there would be a larger cash outlay immediately than under the Patman bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is my understanding.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not worthy of consideration also that under the Vinson bill we would have to pay interest for 10 years on the bonds, which would be issued in payment of the adjusted-service certificates, which would increase the total cost about 30 percent?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I was coming to that later.

Mr. President, the Treasury Department in raising money to pay the adjusted-service certificates under the terms of the Vinson bill, will have to sell bonds under the amended Liberty Loan Act passed by the Congress.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the present limitation on the amount of bonds permitted to be outstanding by the Treasury Department?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think it is about $48,000,000,000. I think we can have outstanding a debt in the nature of a floating debt of about $25,000,000,000 and the balance in long-term bonds, the total of the floating debt and the long-term debt being permissive to the amount of about $48,000,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand the difference between the two bills, aside from the interest matter which the Senator has already discussed, is that payment under the Vinson bill would have to be provided for by the sale of bonds by the Treasury, bearing interest at whatever rate those bonds may bear, while the Patman bill provides for payment by the issue of currency which is not interest bearing.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator is exactly correct. In order to secure money with which to pay the adjusted-service certificates under the terms of the Vinson bill, the Government must sell bonds and pay interest on those bonds at the rate which it has to pay in order to obtain the money. If we should pass the Patman bill, it would provide for the issuance of currency in the form of United States notes. In other words, we propose now to finance the payment of the adjusted-service certificates under the provisions of the Patman bill exactly as the administration financed the Civil War.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Can the Senator from Oklahoma state the amount of interest the taxpayers of the Nation would be required to pay provided the Vinson bill should be passed?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In the event the Vinson bill should be passed and bonds should be issued, the interest would be in the sum of $2,250,000,000 at 3 percent, and the Senator can make his own calculation. We should have to pay approximately 3 percent, and I am not sure that 3-percent bonds could be sold over a long period of time. The bonds probably would run for 20 years; and the Senator can make his own computation. Three percent on two and a quarter billion dollars, multiplied by 20, would give the total sum that would be required as a tax upon the people of America to meet this maturing obligation. We can pay it now for approximately two and a quarter billion dollars; but if we should issue bonds running for 20 years, it would take something like twice that amount of money to liquidate the indebtedness.

During the Civil War—

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that subject I desire to call his attention to the fact that if the bankers get the bonds under the Vinson bill they can issue currency on them. There is not very much difference in this business, except that the soldier gets the money under the one plan, whereas under the other the banker can take the bonds and still put them up and draw currency on them.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator is exactly correct. The banks have the privilege of taking these bonds and issuing credit against them, and making such credit available to the Government, against which the Government can write checks on the banks to pay these sums.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, it is true that the banks could do that; but it is inconceivable that they would do it, because they now have more money than they know what to do with. They have so much that it is bulging out the walls of the banks. Not very much of it is being loaned; and it is not probable that the banks would put up these bonds to obtain more currency unless they should run short of the money they now have.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Let me take issue with the distinguished Senator from Kentucky. He tells the Senate and the country that the banks of America have so much money in their vaults that the walls are about to burst.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, that was a figure of speech, as the Senator understands, though a very large figure of speech.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I should like to know just what the Senator meant. I have heard that statement made on the floor of the Senate a great many times, and the people are inclined to believe it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not made a personal inspection of all the banks to find out how much money they have; but it is well known that the banks have available large amounts of credit which they say are not being called for. Money is not being loaned to private industry or private individuals to absorb this credit; and under the theory I have always entertained, that money circulates in proportion to its demand, unless there should be a demand in the various communities for more money than is now in the possession of the banks, they would not put up these bonds and exchange them for currency.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Let me make a counterstatement to the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky as to the banks' vaults being spread apart because of the great amount of money they contain. The Senator from Kentucky is a rather athletic youngster. I make the statement that the Senator from Kentucky could carry on his back every dollar of money that is in every bank in America, eliminating the silver and the copper.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not quite understand the Senator's statement. Did he say that I could carry on my back all the money that is in the banks?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In all the banks of America today, at this moment.

Mr. BARKLEY. May I do it? [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator has my permission.

Mr. President, there are in this country about 15,000 banks whose doors are open at this moment. I make the statement that there is not enough real money in all the banks of America today to pay the interest for 1 year on the outstanding loans. We now have in existence more than $30,000,000,000 of loans—Federal loans, Liberty bonds, and other kinds of Federal paper.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In just a moment. The interest on the $30,000,000,000 of loans which we owe is almost $1,000,000,000, and at this moment there is not that much money in all the 15,000 banks of America. There is less than $900,000,000; there is less than $800,000,000; there is less than $750,000,000 of all kinds of money in every bank in America at this moment.

I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand, of course, that the Senator from Oklahoma for a long time has advocated putting in circulation a larger amount of money; but I have not understood that as a means of getting that money into circulation he favored the issue of more Government bonds, to be in turn put up by the banks to be exchanged for money.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have understood that the Senator from Oklahoma sought a different method of obtaining a larger amount of money to be put in circulation, and not by the bond-issue route.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator is exactly accurate. I have all the bonds I want, Mr. President—

Mr. BARKLEY. I congratulate the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. And I think the country has all the bonds it wants to pay for. The people of the Nation today are under a load of over $30,000,000,000 of bonds. They must pay the interest from year to year, and in the end they must pay the bonds themselves. So far as I am concerned, I have on my shoulders all the bonds I want to carry, and, in my judgment, the people of America likewise have on their shoulders all the bonds they want to carry; yet the Vinson bill now proposes to authorize and to command the issuance of two and a quarter billion dollars more of bonds to be placed upon the shoulders of the people of America.

The Patman bill does not propose the issuance of additional bonds. It proposes the issuance of money—the kind of money which Senators have in their pockets. I will eliminate the other Senators, and refer to the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], because, so far as I know, he is the only Senator who carries money around in his pockets [laughter], and he denies that the paper he carries is money. It looks more like money, however, than anything else I ever saw.

Mr. President, the United States finds itself today in the same condition in which the North found itself in the sixties. There was a heavy debt upon the country. Bonds could not be sold. That is our condition today. Is there any Senator present who believes that if the United States Government should offer for sale two or three billion dollars of long-term bonds they could be sold at the prevailing rate of interest? Were it not for the fact that the bond market is pegged, where would the price of bonds be at this good hour?

We find ourselves at this moment in the same condition in which the North found itself in the early sixties. I read from page 286 of a book entitled "Financial History of the United States", by Dewey. This is the condition in which the United States found itself in the early sixties:

The North found itself owing $100,000,000 to the Army, and $250,000,000 was due on July 1, 1862.

The banks had exhausted their capital in making loans.

That is about the condition in which our banks find themselves now. The banks are not expanding their circulation, their deposit money, to any appreciable extent. The banks today are just about loaded with Federal bond issues. They cannot take many more, yet they have to take them. There is no other place for the Government to finance itself except through the banks, which have to buy these bonds. The condition is very similar to the condition in 1862.

The banks had exhausted their capital in making loans; money could not be borrowed except at great sacrifice.

That is the condition today. Who can borrow money today? If one has Government bonds, he can borrow money; but the man who has Government bonds does not want to borrow money. How can the people today borrow money on property that is nonproductive, that is nonprofitable?

Money could not be borrowed except at great sacrifice; there was no money to buy bonds.

The same condition exists today. Who today has money with which to buy bonds? What citizen today has money with which to buy bonds? There may be a few, the favored few; but the great masses of the people have no money with which to buy bonds. Only recently the Government brought out an issue of what were called "baby bonds", bonds of small denominations, and advertised them throughout the Nation and tried to sell them to the public. How many bonds have been sold? According to the last account I have seen, less than $40,000,000 worth; practically nothing. The people cannot buy bonds, however much they would like to buy them. They have no money. There is the same condition which existed in the sixties.

Again I read:

Gold and silver has ceased to circulate.

Gold has gone. It has gone to the Federal Treasury. There is no gold in circulation. While there is some silver in circulation, $31,000,000 worth, that is all the silver we have in circulation, save the half dollars and the quarters and the dimes which we have in our pockets for change.

Legal-tender currency was necessary to aid in making further loans.

That is the condition we have today. The people have no money; they have no greenbacks; they have no silver, and they cannot borrow credit at the banks. The same condition exists today which existed in 1862. The Government tried to float bonds then, and it could not float them.

I read again from this historical publication. On page 307 I find this language:

The Loan Act of February 25, 1862, authorized the issue of $500,000,000 of bonds redeemable after 5, and payable 20 years from date, bearing 6-percent interest.

Mr. SMITH. Bearing how much?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Six percent. In 1862 the North authorized the issue of $500,000,000 of 6-percent bonds. Could they sell them? Here is the history:

The bonds could be sold "at the market value" for either coin or Treasury notes. This act proved to be of little immediate assistance, for previous to December 1862 only $23,750,000 of the issue were sold.

Six-percent bonds! From February until December, for almost a year, the Government tried to sell these long-term 6-percent bonds; and after nearly a year's work the Government sold less than $25,000,000 of them. I hope our credit is now better than that; but if we should authorize the issuance of a billion or two billion dollars of bonds, and offer them in the open market, what bidders would we have for them? What chance would we have to sell them to the public of America? The people cannot buy them, because they have not the money. They cannot go to the banks to borrow. The banks will not lend. That is one reason, in my judgment, why we are not having popular bond campaigns put on in this country. Long-term bonds could not be sold at a reasonable rate of interest because there is no money in circulation.

What did the Government do in 1862? Exactly what we propose today. They did exactly what they had to do. They could not sell their bonds. Money was out of circulation. The only money they had was gold and silver. So the Government proposed to authorize the issuance of $500,000,000 of Treasury notes. They were called greenbacks. We have some of them in our pockets, old-time Lincolnian greenbacks, United States Treasury notes, the best money in the United States. This money is backed by all the property of all the people, plus the taxing power of the Government.

There is no money anywhere that is better than a greenback. We issued $456,000,000 of them. They carried on the North during the war. When the war was over, there was a chance for uncontrolled expansion, uncontrolled inflation. But the North did not go to uncontrolled inflation. They had no gold, no silver, no credit, and still they did not let the situation get out of hand. As soon as the war was over, the North joined with the South, began to reconstruct the Nation, gathered up the purse strings, tightened up taxing, stopped the further issuance of notes, and in 10 years' time they had paid off $10,000,000 of the greenbacks, and as the greenbacks were paid off, money became scarcer, and as money became scarcer, money became higher, and as money went up, prices went down.

Congress, away back yonder, understood the money question. They saw that as fast as they paid off the greenbacks, making money scarce, making money high, making property values low, that was the wrong trend, and Congress passed a law to prevent the further retirement of greenbacks. Then they passed a second law. Not only did they pass a law to prevent the further retirement of greenbacks, but they passed a law providing that greenbacks then in circulation should be continued in circulation, and from 1878 until this date those greenbacks have been kept in constant circulation. Today, $346,000,000 of those old-fashioned Lincolnian greenbacks, issued away back in the 60's, are in circulation, and there is no better money in the United States.

There are no bonds back of that money, no bonds pledged to support the greenbacks. At one time there was $450,000,000 of gold in the Treasury to back them up. But now gold has all been placed in a common pool, so the gold we have is not back of money in circulation today.

A year ago some of those who were favorable to greenbacks asked the Treasury of the United States to make computation and to advise us as to how much money the people had been saved because they did not have to pay interest on bonds to support this greenback issue, $346,000,000 of greenbacks in circulation for 70 years, with no bonds back of them. No interest was paid by anyone to support that money, and because no interest was paid, the people saved the interest, and that meant a saving to the public of more than $11,000,000,000 in interest, which the public did not have to pay because there were no bonds back of the greenbacks.

Mr. CONNALLY. There was a reserve in the Treasury, was there not?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. One hundred and fifty million dollars of gold was raised and placed in the Treasury back of those greenbacks.

What is the condition now? We are not in the condition we were in during the Civil War. At that time they had no gold, they had no silver, they had no credit, and had no paper money.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, pursuing the question the Senator from Texas asked the Senator from Oklahoma as to whether we had a reserve for the redemption of a percentage of those outstanding greenbacks, still we did not pay any interest on either, so that the amount of interest saved, from the time the greenbacks went into circulation to this date, according to the statisticians, is $11,000,000,000. That amount was saved to the taxpayers.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I am sure the able Senator will add to his observations, wise as they are, that at the present time we have a united government, with a very greatly increased credit, as compared with the time referred to, in the sixties, when we had a divided country, with a very much diminished credit.

I ask my able friend, if greenbacks can be issued by the Government in notes such as those to which he alludes, why cannot that be done under the Vinson bill just as completely as it can be done under the Patman bill, in view of the fact that the amendment tendered by the able Senator from Oklahoma himself, which carries the amount to be paid under the Vinson bill, in no wise prescribes bonds? I should like to know whether we could not issue the same paper if we issued the notes under the Vinson bill as under the Patman bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I want to be entirely frank with the distinguished Senator from Illinois. He is correct; the Government could do that if it would, provided we made a slight amendment in existing law. Two years ago an amendment was adopted to the Agricultural Adjustment Act to authorize the President to issue $3,000,000,000 of Treasury notes, the same kind we are talking about, and to put them into circulation to retire outstanding interest-bearing obligations.

The certificates are not interest bearing. If we would provide a simple amendment directing the President to use the $3,000,000,000 fund to retire these certificates, then he could use the $3,000,000,000 he has under his control. But I venture the assertion that unless we amend the law the President could not use his power under the amendment of last year to pay these certificates in greenbacks or Treasury notes.

It would take an amendment to existing law permitting him to do it. Otherwise he could not do it.

There is now no law under which the Treasury can issue greenbacks save under the amendment to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, adopted 2 years ago. That is the only power under which they could issue greenbacks. They can issue Federal Reserve notes; they can issue Federal Reserve bank notes; they can issue silver certificates; and they can issue greenbacks to retire outstanding interest-bearing obligations. But these certificates are not interest-bearing obligations. The interest has been figured in, and to that extent they are not interest bearing.

I was about to show the difference between the condition of the country in the sixties and the present condition. Then we had no gold; then we had no silver; then we had no paper money; then we had no credit. We had to issue paper money.

On May the 3d last there was in the Treasury the sum of $8,725,313,788.85 in gold. On May the 3d last there was in the Treasury in silver of all kinds, save subsidiary silver, $806,000,000. If we add those two sums together, we find we have more than nine and a half billion dollars of gold and silver in our Treasury. But we cannot use it. We are not paying out the gold, because we adopted a policy of keeping our gold in reserve and not putting it into circulation, on the theory that if it was in circulation it would be taken out of circulation and hoarded.

Neither is the silver in circulation. The people do not care for silver money to carry around in their pockets when they can get paper of the same value. Paper money serves their purpose better. So at the present time we have the gold and silver, but cannot use it except in the way we are now proposing to use it. We have nine and a half billion of gold and silver in our strong box. Against that we have circulation of five and a half billion of all kinds of money. Subtract five and a half billion from the total of nine and a half billion, and we find we have over $4,000,000,000 of gold and silver in the Treasury, against which there is no money in circulation.

Now, because we propose to issue some money against that surplus, it is said we are standing for fiat money, that we are standing for printing-press money. Printing-press money is the only kind of money we have. If you have money in your pockets, it is, except for the halves and the quarters and the dimes and the nickels and the pennies, printing-press money. That is all the money the Nation has, save the gold and silver in the Treasury, and the gold cannot be secured, and no one wants the silver when he can get paper. The people prefer printing-press money to silver. They used to take the printing-press money in preference to gold.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Is it not a fact that after the Government issues two billion three or four hundred million dollars of what the enemies of the Patman plan call "printing-press money", there will still be in the Treasury a gold and silver reserve of approximately $2,000,000,000?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Almost that.

Mr. NEELY. Against which there will not be a single paper dollar outstanding?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Exactly so. I am going to vote for the Patman bill. I am going to vote against the Vinson bill as an amendment, which will mean that I will vote "no." My vote will be "no" against the Vinson bill. That means that I prefer the Patman bill. Then if the Vinson bill shall be rejected, that will leave the Patman bill, and when that comes up for a vote, I will vote "aye." As between the Vinson bill and the Patman bill I am for the Patman bill, and I will vote against the Vinson bill, so my next vote will be "no." When the Vinson bill is out of the way, that will leave the Patman bill, and on that my vote will be "aye."

Reenforcing what the distinguished Senator from West Virginia has said, if we pass the Patman bill, and if we issue the new money, the kind of money that is called "printing-press money", and pay the soldiers of the United States, four and a half million of them, scattered in all parts of the United States, it will distribute the money everywhere. If we shall print this new money, which will be just like the money Senators have in their pockets, we will pay the soldiers wherever they may be, and after paying them we will still have in the Treasury almost $2,000,000,000 of gold and silver, against which there is no money printed and in circulation.

Is that fiat money? Fiat money is printing-press money against which there is no gold or silver, no metal, no possible means of redemption.

That is fiat money. Well, this is not fiat money. A Treasury note is the note of the Government. It is the promise of the United States to pay. The United States of America has behind these notes all the property of all the people, plus the taxing power of the United States Government; and that is the best money in America.

Mr. President, let me call attention at this point to some newspaper clippings which I have recently noticed. In Rome there is now meeting a world-wide cotton conference. It is composed of the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners Associations of England, and to this conference have come delegates from all the cotton-producing countries in the world. These representatives, meeting in Rome to discuss the cotton situation, have canvassed the whole problem of cotton and its troubles. Here is a news story of the Associated Press, of date May 2:

MONETARY EXPANSION TO RAISE PRICES URGED

ROME, May 2.—World-wide monetary expansion to raise prices was recommended today to the World Cotton Congress meeting here in a report by the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners Association of Manchester, England.

There is a world-wide organization which has made a world-wide study of the problem confronting the world, especially with reference to cotton. This convention proposes an expansion of the currencies of the world, so as to make money more plentiful throughout the world, so as to make money cheaper throughout the world; and to the extent that money is made plentiful, to the extent that money is made cheaper, to that extent prices will be raised.

There is the recommendation of a world-wide organization in session only a few days ago in Rome.

I have here also a leaf from the American Bankers' Magazine of recent date. That is presumed to be a rather conservative publication, and it is. It speaks for the bankers of America. I find in the issue of April 26—less than 2 weeks ago—the statement that a prominent banker of St. Paul made a trip through South America, 22,000 miles, by airplane, and visited all the countries of South America. When he came back he was interviewed; and I desire to read his short interview, which is quoted from the American Banker, the issue of April 26, 1935:

ST. PAUL BANKER REPORTS INFLATION IN SOUTH AMERICA

ST. PAUL, MINN.—Richard C. Lilly, president of the First National Bank here, returning from a 2 months' vacation—a 22,000-mile air jaunt—to various South American countries, reports inflation everywhere he went.

"In nearly every South American country the currency has been depreciated", he said. "Our money was worth 2 to 4 times its value in this country, depending, of course, on where you were. Argentina's money was the most stable."

But in spite of the depreciated currency, he said, economic conditions in South America as a whole are good. There is a minimum of unemployment.

Who is afraid of a little expansion of the currency? I think it must be admitted that the expansion proposed is not dangerous. It conforms with every orthodox rule of sound finance by issuing money against gold and silver. That cannot be inflation. That cannot be dangerous.

The countries of South America have issued more money. Money there is more plentiful; money is cheaper; prices are higher; and this famous banker of St. Paul makes the statement that the inflation in South America has brought about beneficial conditions; that everywhere business is good; that there is no unemployment.

Mr. President, why will not the United States Congress follow the policy of South America, of Japan, of practically every country in the world save France and Switzerland, and further expand the currency, further cheapen the dollar, further raise prices, to the end that the people shall have a chance to obtain some money with which to pay their taxes and to pay their interest and to pay their debts?

Some time ago I sent a letter to what I considered to be the most renowned financial experts of the world. I sent a letter to every person whom I could hear of who had a reputation on financial matters. I asked these gentlemen, these financiers, bankers, and economists, famous men throughout the world, to send me a confidential letter advising me what they think we should do to help ourselves get out of the depression. I have received replies to practically all the letters I sent. I mailed about 50 letters and have received replies to most of them. I advised these gentlemen that I should not make their letters public, and I have not made them public. I promise not to make any of them public today; but I desire to give the Senate the benefit of what I construe to be the consensus of opinion of these bankers and financiers in Europe and throughout the world.

Without exception, these authorities, the best in the world, recommend that the first thing we should do in America is to stabilize our currency, but they say we cannot stabilize our currency until the value of our currency has been adjusted. While they do not say so, I think none of them considered that the present value of the dollar was at the right figure, from its value standpoint, where it can be adjusted.

We proceeded to adjust our dollar, and we have our dollar reduced in gold content 40 percent. The gold dollar today has only 60 percent of its former gold content. Every dollar abroad is in effect a gold dollar. The moment a dollar of American money gets outside the United States, that dollar becomes in effect a gold dollar. In other words, it has the value of a gold dollar when it is abroad, but here in America, inside the United States, our dollars do not have the value of the new gold dollar.

We have this condition in the world:

We have American money in foreign countries on a gold basis—15.25 grains of gold in each one of those gold dollars, and that is their value abroad. Here in the United States, however, we do not have the gold dollar. We have the commodity dollar. This commodity dollar is not worth 6 percent of what it used to be. It is still worth $1.24 as measured in terms of gold. The result is that we have the anomaly of a 60-cent gold dollar abroad and a $1.24 dollar within the confines of the United States.

Are we prepared to stabilize our dollar with that condition prevailing? Most certainly not. I can find no one who will say that we have the dollar at the point where it is going to be stabilized. If we are going to stabilize the dollar, which dollar are we going to stabilize—the dollar abroad, or the dollar here at home?

Let me explain the difference between the two dollars. The dollar has not fallen much in value here in the United States. Take the automobile industry: Today we can buy cars at the same price at which we could buy them before we cut the content of the dollar. Take the cars in the thousand-dollar class, or those below a thousand dollars. We can buy the lower-priced cars for less than a thousand dollars, the same price they brought before we reduced the gold content of the dollar. Today we can go abroad and buy our dollars for 60 cents.

In other words, if one of us should be abroad, he could take $600 of gold on the old valuation and buy a thousand dollars of American money. With that thousand dollars he could buy one of these new thousand-dollar cars. That means we have reduced the price of our automobiles abroad 40 percent; yet here in America they sell for about the same price. They have not been reduced here in value, but they have been reduced abroad.

The same thing is true of wheat. Had we not done what we did do, wheat in the West would have been selling today for less than 50 cents a bushel; cotton in the South would have been selling today for around 6 cents a pound; because wheat is an international commodity, because corn is an international commodity, because cotton is an international commodity, and automobiles are likewise an international commodity. So we have not stabilized our dollar in America. We are not ready to stabilize the dollar. Every one of the experts to whom I wrote recommended that we should stabilize our American money; but before we can stabilize the American dollar we must adjust its value, and we have not done that. The dollar is still too high.

I am for the Patman bill because by placing more money in circulation we shall make money more plentiful, we shall make money cheaper, and bring down the value of the dollar so that we perhaps can stabilize it in the near future. Before it can possibly be stabilized it must be cheapened.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I address the Senator and first ask what the Senator really means by stabilizing the American dollar. Second, by what money of any country today in the world would my able friend say we could stabilize the American money without loss to the American dollar?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, before America is ready to consider stabilization we must first get the value of our dollar to the point which will best serve American domestic economic policy. Before we can consider the point at which we should stabilize the dollar we must look at our annual tax debt, we must look at our annual interest debt, we must look at our massive debt structure, both public and private. So when we begin to fix the value of the dollar for stabilization purposes we must fix the value of the dollar with relation to the debt structure. We have first taxes, second interest, and third the debts themselves.

We have a $15,000,000,000 annual tax bill which we must meet. In order that the people may pay these taxes of $15,000,000,000 we must have the dollar at such a point in value that the people can possibly get the dollar to meet their taxes. Otherwise they will never pay their taxes; and if the taxes are not paid the Nation will fall. If the State taxes are not paid the State will fall. If the city taxes are not paid the city will fall. If the county and district taxes are not paid the counties and districts will fall. Unless taxes are paid governments of all kinds will universally fall.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am sure my able friend does not intend to mean that the Federal Government taxes amount to $15,000,000,000. He comprehends all the taxes—Federal, State, municipal, county, and so forth?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Federal taxes aggregate about $5,000,000,000 annually today. Then the balance of our taxes—State taxes, county taxes, city taxes, and district taxes, taxes of all kinds and character—make up the gigantic sum of $15,000,000,000.

The outlay is more. We are spending more than $15,000,000,000 yearly, but the tax bill we are levying is approximately $15,000,000,000 a year. That is only one item. We must keep those taxes constantly in view, and the dollar must be fixed in relation to the tax bill to start with.

Then we have, second, the interest bill. We have a total debt in a minimum sum of approximately $250,000,000,000. Responsible authorities figure that our total mass debt, public and private, is something like $250,000,000,000. A part of the interest on that sum is paid by taxes, so I eliminate that portion; but the interest on the portion of this indebtedness which may be denominated the private debt is estimated to be something like $10,000,000,000 a year. So we must fix the value of the dollar at such a low figure that the people who work and who produce may obtain the dollars with which to meet that interest bill. If dollars are too high, they cannot possibly get them. The farmers of the West cannot produce wheat at 26 cents a bushel and obtain sufficient dollars with which to pay their taxes or with which to pay their interest or with which to pay their debts. The dollar must be so cheap that the farmers of the West and the farmers of the South and the factories of the North can produce their commodities and receive for the things they produce sufficient of these dollars not only to pay the cost of production but to enable them to have a profit so that they may live.

So the economists and financiers to whom I have referred recommend, first, that we should stabilize our money; but before we can stabilize we must first adjust and regulate. That is what we are trying to do by the passage of the Patman bill. We are trying to put more money in circulation, to drive down the domestic dollar to a value comparable to that of the gold dollar abroad. The gold dollar abroad is worth 60 cents, while the domestic dollar is worth 124 cents. That is inconsistent; it is ridiculous.

Mr. President, the Patman bill, in my opinion, will do the thing that we want to have done; it will make the dollar cheaper. The dollar has to be made cheaper. The people cannot pay their taxes with the present high-priced dollars; they cannot pay their interest with the present high-priced dollars; they will never pay their debts with these high-priced dollars, for the people cannot get a sufficient number of them.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, would my able friend, by a process of legislation, further devalue the dollar as it now stands? I ask the question for information.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am not prepared to answer that question at this time. I do not know; no one knows. At the present time the gold dollar is far cheaper than the legal domestic dollar. The old-fashioned gold dollar is worth 60 cents, while the new dollar is worth $1.24 in terms of commodities. So I state here that our present domestic dollar is much more valuable than is our gold dollar abroad.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CONNALLY in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is speaking about the gold dollar. On what standard are we now in the United States?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Abroad we are on the gold standard, while domestically we are on the commodity standard.

Mr. BORAH. I find that the only paper money that comes to my hands which is redeemable is a silver certificate.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. The only metal we can get is silver.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. The only redeemable money we have, then, is the silver certificate?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. Then we are on a silver basis, are we not?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Not exactly, for this reason: The silver dollar is worth only about 60 cents. I have here [exhibiting] a silver dollar; I carry it as a souvenir. With silver worth 75 cents an ounce, the silver in this dollar is worth about 60 cents.

Mr. BORAH. That is, as a commodity.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. But it passes for a dollar.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The same as a paper dollar passes for a dollar.

Mr. BORAH. But the only money we have which has a redeemer is the silver certificate?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

I want to make it clear, Mr. President, that the United States is on the gold standard abroad. Every dollar beyond the confines of the boundary lines of the United States is on the basis of the value of fifteen and five twenty-one hundredths grains of gold; yet here in America the paper dollar we have in our pockets has no relation to gold; it is not redeemable in gold. The dollar we have here is strictly and purely a commodity dollar. One has to take these dollars abroad in order to get gold for them, and the moment they are taken abroad they are worth 60 cents of the old dollar, but here they are worth 124½ cents. I think I have made that clear.

These economists are of the universal opinion that the first thing we must do is to stabilize, and in stabilizing we must first adjust and regulate the value of our dollar. We have not done that as yet, and apparently we are not proposing to do it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose the Patman bill should become the law of the land, and the new currency proposed to be issued under the Patman bill should be put in circulation; what would be behind that money?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. All the gold and all the silver in our Treasury and all the property of the United States, plus all the people of the United States, plus the taxing power of the Government.

Mr. BORAH. What would be the difference between that money and the money which is now in circulation?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The money we now have in circulation is backed in the same way.

Mr. BORAH. It is the Senator's opinion, then, that this currency would have the same backing as the currency we now have?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Exactly so.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator consider that the eight and a half billion dollars of gold which we have is the property of the United States?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is.

Mr. BORAH. The United States has issued gold certificates to the Federal Reserve banks. Does that have any bearing upon the question of the title to the gold?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Not at all. The Federal Reserve banks surrendered their gold to the United States Treasury, and the gold and silver now are the property of the United States Treasury. It is true that the United States Treasury issued gold certificates to these banks, and, under a licensing system these banks can get gold in order to make international settlement, and private citizens through the Federal Reserve System can get gold in order to make international settlements, but the gold itself is the property of the United States.

I have on my desk, as every other Senator has upon his desk, the Treasury statement of May 3. Such statements come to us daily. Here is the headline of this statement:

Daily statement of the United States Treasury compiled from latest proved reports from Treasury offices and depositories May 3, 1935.

Current assets and liabilities.
Gold.

The amount I read a moment ago. That must mean that this gold is the property of the United States Government, acting through the United States Treasury.

The money we have in circulation is backed today almost 2 for 1 by gold and silver. If we should issue a little more currency we would still have more gold and silver than we would have money outstanding.

I realize that the more money placed in circulation the cheaper money becomes, just as the greater the quantity of wheat grown each year the cheaper wheat becomes, and the more cotton produced the cheaper cotton becomes, and the more corn produced the cheaper corn becomes, and the more of anything produced the cheaper that commodity becomes. That is operation of the law of supply and demand, and the United States Government has recognized that law.

Two years ago we had too much wheat and then Congress, in conjunction with the Agricultural Department and the administration, decided upon the policy of restricting wheat production in order to make wheat scarcer and to make wheat higher, following out that economic law of supply and demand. Then Congress and the administration decided to make cotton scarcer so as to make cotton higher and more valuable, and the same economic law was placed in operation by making pigs and hogs scarcer in order to make pigs higher. The same economic law affecting the price of wheat, affecting the price of cotton, affecting the price of corn, affecting the price of hogs, and affecting the price of anything applies to money.

Make money scarcer, and money is made high. Inasmuch as money measures commodities, when money is high values of all kinds are cheap. It is my judgment that the administration made a mistake by applying the same economic law to money that it applied to cattle and hogs and to corn and to cotton. We could have raised the prices of those commodities, instead of by restricting their production, by applying the same rule and increasing the amount of money in circulation. We could have increased the price of cotton not by plowing under cotton but by placing more money in circulation; we could have increased the price of hogs, not by killing the helpless little pigs but by placing more money in circulation. That is what I have been arguing for 4 years upon the floor of the United States Senate—to raise the price of commodities, not by depriving the people of clothing and of food but by placing money in circulation, just as the other nations of the world have done, and the United States has refused to do.

Mr. President, the first problem before the United States Government is to regulate or to adjust the value of the American dollar. If it is at the right value now, keep it there; if it is too high in value, reduce its value. If it is now too cheap, raise its value. Does any Senator upon this floor or does anyone anywhere say that the dollar today is too cheap? I think not. Does anyone say that the dollar of today has the correct buying power? I do not think it has the correct buying power. I am convinced that before we can get out of the depression, we must have more money in circulation; we must have cheaper dollars; and in order to obtain cheaper dollars, we must have more of those dollars in circulation. So the first problem is to reduce the value of the dollar to that point where it should be best to serve the interest of America and the people of America.

I am supporting the Patman bill in order to get more money in circulation, in order to make money more plentiful, in order to make money cheaper and to raise prices so that the people may live.

The Senator from Kentucky this morning said that the banks were bursting with money. Fifteen thousand banks at this hour altogether do not have $800,000,000 of real money within their vaults. They do not have sufficient money with which to pay the interest on the national debt for 1 year. Yet we are told that we have enough money in circulation. Mr. President, the present session of Congress before it shall have adjourned—and I do not know when that will be—will have appropriated as much money as twice the amount of money in circulation in America. The people of these United States must every 12 months earn every dollar of money that is in circulation twice over in order to pay Federal taxes. That does not take into consideration paying State taxes; it does not take into consideration paying the city taxes, county taxes, or district taxes. The people must earn this money by next year in order to pay the appropriations which will be passed by the Congress now in session.

Mr. President, I am going to read just a paragraph from a letter sent to me from across the water. The letter came from Great Britain. I shall give an analysis of the letters I have received from America. They hold first that we must adjust the value of the dollar. When that is done then we are ready to propose stabilization. We are not ready now. We can never be ready to propose stabilization to the other nations of the world until we adjust the value of the dollar to that point where it will best serve America's economic policy. I want to read from the letter of a man whom I consider one of the foremost economists of England and what he says about the world's stabilization of currency. I shall not give his name because I am under obligation not to do so. I read:

To revive international trade it is necessary to revive international confidence. It is necessary to re-create an atmosphere in which men will enter on international commitments with something of the confidence with which they enter on commitments within their own boundaries. It is necessary to create an atmosphere in which international capital movements take place by reason of profit rather than for the reasons of safety—the main motive of such movements at present. Such an atmosphere cannot exist in a world of fluctuating exchanges. Until the exchanges of the leading financial centers are stabilized, it is idle to hope for extensive revival of either international trade or international investment. As we shall see later on, so long as we remain unstabilized, there is an ever-present danger of the disappearance of the recovery that has already taken place.

Mr. President, the words of this famous foreign economist reinforce the opinions of leading economists and financiers of America. This Englishman states that the first problem is to stabilize local currency and then to stabilize world currency. We cannot have any perceptible degree of return of prosperity until this identical thing shall have been accomplished as outlined by these letters and statements.

Mr. President, I find apparently very little interest in this matter. I know it has been discussed by the hour. I presume every Senator has made up his mind as to how he expects to vote. I desire before I conclude to ask permission to have placed in the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Hearst papers of this date. The editorial is under the headline "Veterans deserve bonus payment now. Senate should pass Patman bill." I ask permission to insert the editorial in the RECORD as a part of my remarks without having it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Herald of May 7, 1935]

VETERANS DESERVE BONUS PAYMENT NOW—SENATE SHOULD PASS PATMAN BILL

With the Federal Government undertaking the expenditure of more than four thousand million dollars by Executive allotments, it is difficult to understand why the administration should be opposed to the Patman veterans' bonus bill.

The Patman bill would distribute, at once, among veterans, $2,015,000,000 in United States currency.

The measure is already half way through Congress. It was passed last month in the House of Representatives by a decisive majority.

It would add nothing to the actual liabilities of the Government. On the contrary, it would mean merely the payment now of an interest-bearing obligation which the Federal Government has legally acknowledged, and which, if not paid off now, will have to be paid in 1945 at much greater cost than immediate payment entails.

Why, then, should not the Patman bill be passed by the Senate and approved by the President, and the veterans' adjusted-compensation certificates be taken up at once?

In the Senate, both the Vinson bill and the Harrison bill are being supported by some Members as substitutes for the Patman bill.

Last week, the Senate adopted an amendment to the Vinson bill appropriating approximately $2,260,000,000 for payment of the bonus out of the Treasury.

If the Vinson bill is passed in this form, its veto is predicted by administration supporters.

The great merit of the Patman bill is that it avoids an appropriation of money which must be met by taxation or borrowing, by providing simply that currency be issued against the adjustment-compensation certificates outstanding, exactly as currency may be issued against other Federal obligations.

No bond issue would be required. New taxes would not be necessary.

Opponents of the Patman bill have said that it is "inflationary."

Yet on Friday last O. M. W. Sprague, a former adviser to the Federal Treasury and an anti-inflationist, was asked in the Senate Banking Committee if the issuance of two thousand million dollars in currency for the soldiers' bonus would be inflation.

Not in itself, he said. A succession of steps would be necessary to produce inflation.

In point of fact, the issues behind the Patman bonus bill were stated several weeks ago by William Randolph Hearst in an editorial asking, "Why economize only in the case of the veterans?"

Declaring that the administration's lavish program for spending is "merely penurious toward the veterans", Mr. Hearst wrote:

"Why be penurious to them?
"Certainly they have deserved well of the country; they have rendered the most signal service that citizens can possibly render to their Nation.

"And they are rendering the greatest service of citizenship today. They are the defenders of the American faith, the protectors of American liberties, the maintainers of peace and order, the opponents of the enemy from without and from within.

"Why not include these splendid citizens in the bounty that is being so freely distributed?

"Let us remember also that the Government is not creating a new obligation in paying the veterans the promised bonus.

"Sometime or other it is going to pay the veterans this money. It has pledged itself to that program.

"Why not pay the money now when it is most needed and have that obligation eliminated?

"Why not discharge this obligation, actually incurred and patriotically due, and then very properly and wisely enter on an era of sensible economy?"

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Likewise I have received a great number of telegrams from all parts of the country not only favoring the payment of the adjusted-service certificates, but universally favoring the passage of the Patman bill. I desire as a part of my remarks to have printed in the RECORD at this point a telegram received from the Committee for the Nation advocating the payment of the bonus and the passage of the Patman bill.

There being no objection the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 5, 1935.

ELMER THOMAS,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Please permit us to suggest that if bonus be paid it can be accomplished safely without borrowing through issuing currency against present broadened gold and silver base or against existing profits from gold and silver revaluation. This would save bond interest and harbors no inflationary dangers.

COMMITTEE FOR THE NATION.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I also ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a message received from the National Farmers' Union. This telegram likewise demands payment of the adjusted-service certificates, and in order to pay those certificates it asks for passage of the Patman bill.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 5, 1935.

Senator ELMER THOMAS,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

The position of the National Farmers' Union is that it is in the best interest of the American farmer, and in the public welfare, that the adjusted-service certificates of veterans be immediately paid, with full legal-tender Government currency. We respectfully request your support and influence to secure the passage of the Thomas-Patman bill now before the United States Senate. We respectfully urge you to oppose the effort to tie an interest-bearing tax-exempt bond issue to the payment of this just debt of the Government to the veterans. The fact of this obligation and the question of the immediate payment of the certificates has ceased to be an issue. The remaining question at issue is whether the money is to be provided by issuing tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds, which increases the obligation, pays the bankers a bonus, and defeats the beneficial effects of payment, or by issuing Government currency which is constitutional, is sound, converts an obligation into a medium of exchange, expands the currency reasonably, multiplies the benefits to veterans, restores self-dependence and earning capacity, and is in the public welfare.

NATIONAL FARMERS' UNION,
E. H. EVERSON, President.
EDWARD E. KENNEDY, Secretary.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the only issue before the Senate is how we are going to raise the money to pay the bill. The Vinson bill provides for the issuance of bonds and the selling of bonds to raise the money. Not only will we have to raise the amount in the first instance, $2,250,000,000, but if we issue bonds we will have to pay interest on them for the time they run. The interest on the bonds plus payment of the bonds in the last analysis would be a tax on the people over a series of years of approximately $5,000,000,000.

The Patman bill provides for payment of the soldiers' bonus by the issuance of money, the same kind of money we have in our pockets at this hour, the same kind of money we have used for 7 years, the same kind of money we used to finance the North in the War between the States, the same kind of money we have now and the same kind of money we will have in the future.

Fiat money? Some may call it fiat money if they desire to do so, but it has none of the elements of fiat money. Printing-press money! Of course, it is printing-press money because it is printed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, but it is the same kind of money all the people have and which they are glad to get.

PAYMENT BY CURRENCY OR BY BONDS AND TAXES

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, it has now been settled by Senate roll call that the outstanding veterans' adjusted certificates are to be paid. The issue has thus been simplified to this:

Shall the payment be made in a new issue of currency, as the veterans desire it paid, or shall the payment come in the form of new bond issues, an increased burden and increased taxes?

Non-interest-bearing currency issues without added taxes versus new interest-bearing bond issues to be met by taxes—this is the issue which now faces the Senate.

The House is already on record by an overwhelming majority for the Patman plan of a currency issue, the plan for which the veterans have been fighting for many sessions. If we accept the House bill, we can end this fight on one roll call, and then pass on to the other voluminous business of this daily lengthening session.

Shall we settle this issue without further piling up the annual mountainous interest burden, now approximating $1,000,000,000 a year, which is greater than our total revenue from income taxation, already so high that it sends a shiver down the backs of the producers in every industry that earns an income to tax?

Shall we settle the problem that has faced the country ever since Armistice Day, 17 years ago, and settle it as the veterans want it settled; settle it as the responsive House has voted to settle it; settle it as the waiting friends and dependents of the veterans want it settled—settle it with new currency, and settle it now?

The simple statement of the issue should be enough. Do we want to be particeps criminis to further bond issues at a time when the interest-bearing public debt—including authorizations necessitated by $6,000,000,000 of recent or pending appropriations—is piling up far above the World War peak?

How can we justify our vote to the farmers and business men and taxpayers or consumers and wage earners by voting for new bond issues, new interest burdens, and new taxes to eat up income and wages and increase the high-living costs of 30,000,000 families?

One thing is plain: We cannot vote for the Vinson bond-raising plan when we have every opportunity to avoid it by voting for the Patman bill, and then deplore the mountain of interest-bearing debt we have had a fractional part in creating.

Can we justify ourselves by saying, "We voted for a new issue of $2,300,000,000 of interest-bearing bonds further to withdraw money from industry and pile it up in frozen Federal issue, when it was needed in industrial enterprises to buy materials and pay wages. We voted to pile up Federal debt, even when we were implored to vote a currency issue to facilitate all business and help the boys and their dependents to meet their store bills and buy their necessities. We voted to increase taxes, though we had a chance to pay the veteran debt without increase of taxation. We voted for interest coupons and taxes in preference to needed increase of the money circulation, now contracted by the withdrawal of $8,000,000,000 of gold from circulation."

Shall we tell the truth to the folks on the farms, in the shops, and in the homes, the great army of the "forgotten", who pay all the taxes in the end when they pay their living costs, "We are sorry, folks, that we voted to increase your living costs by voting for bonds, interest coupons, and added taxation, when we could have voted a currency issue and avoided soaking you; but, you see, we were afraid of that White House club and that Wall Street threat; we were listening to the poor profiteers at the 'wailing wall', who were crying for interest coupons; and when that White House club went up we were so scared that we simply forgot all about you."

Thus the issue which actually confronts us here is this: Are we men, statesmen unafraid, dependable representatives, true to the people of our respective States, or cowards afraid of the club of a White House veto?

After we sent 4,000,000 boys into the trenches and shambles of Europe, shall we be so cringing and craven that we dare not appear on the battle line, even to the extent of facing a White House club? If we remember that the Democratic administration under Wilson, after its promise to keep us out of war, treacherously dragged us in, perhaps we shall have the understanding and hardihood not to allow another Democratic administration, under the pupil Roosevelt, to sidestep its manifest duty and responsibilities to the Nation and to the other Democratic administration, whose blunders, extravagances, and follies are the root of the tree of our present despair, brought into full bloom and flower today under another similar illusion of grandeur. If we are faced with another war—and we shall be if this administration is to fulfill its ambition—shall the courage of our vote today be an example to inspire our boys' courage to face guns and bombshells?

What kind of bonds will be issued to pay these 3,500,000 veterans their few hundred dollars each? Will they be paid in the $1,000 bonds of Wall Street or in the "baby bonds" of small issues now being peddled by the administration, and worth $18.75 for a $25 bond? Undoubtedly in the latter, because only the smaller denominations will fit the case.

What are these "baby bonds", the new-deal infantile issues, worth? Listen to Morgenthau and Farley in their recent screen advertisement. You can get a $25 "infantile bond" by paying $18.75. That is what they are worth—25 percent below par face.

In other words, these "infantiles" are already infected 25 percent. One-fourth of their face is gone, eaten up by a new-deal tuberculosis, or some other new-deal administration disease. They are diseased bonds. They have a face which says "$25", but as you can buy one of them for $18.75, that is all that it is worth.

Thus, what the Senate may find itself voting for is an issue of $2,300,000,000 of "infantile tuberculosis" bonds to pay the boys who offered their lives to save the country.

We undertake to pay these boys $1.25 a day if they went "over there" and $1 a day if they remained over here; and then, to reward their service and inspire their courage, we vote for an "infantile tuberculosis" bond issue, with one-fourth of its face eaten away, to reward the honorable scars of war.

Suppose, on the other hand, this $2,300,000,000 of new bonds is at first issued to a Wall Street syndicate in large denominations. What can that syndicate do? They can turn around and exchange that investment for baby bonds—the "infantiles" affected by new-deal diseases—and for every $25 they will pay only $18.75. They will make a rake-off of 25 percent on the whole issue. A rake-off of 25 percent on $2,300,000,000 will net a profit or net income of over $500,000,000, on which they will be tax exempt.

We who vote for this bond-issue substitute vote for a national scandal, vote for a swindle of $500,000,000—vote to reward those who gave their lives to "save democracy" by passing to them $2,300,000,000 of "infantile" diseased bonds with one-fourth their face missing!

Is that the way to reward the saviors of the Nation in time of war? Is that the example which the Senate of the Seventy-fourth Congress wishes to pass down to history?

To pay these certificates by new bond issues, new interest burdens, and new taxes is wrong.

It is the wrong way in the interest of Government credit and business confidence. It is the wrong way in the interest of taxpayers and consumers. It is the wrong way in the interest of American patriotism as represented by 3,500,000 fighting men who marched down the streets of our cities under the old flag and left their loved ones to "make the world safe for democracy." The fact that it was not made safe for democracy, but was made safe for grandiose ideas of dictatorship all over the world, was not their fault, but the fault of the then Democratic administration, which laid the groundwork for the international attack upon our Republic which the head pupil of that administration is today seeking to carry to its ultimate end—the subversion of our representative government—our Republic of government of law to a lock-stepping regimenting dictatorship of men.

Let us not, at least deliberately, carry into our citadel this Trojan horse.

Let us settle this old question of 17 years now and on the next roll call by voting for the passage of the House bill, which represents the long-delayed wishes of the veterans, their pleas and prayers for, session after session. Let us settle it right and settle it now.

Mr. McADOO obtained the floor.

Mr. BACHMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McADOO. I do.

Mr. BACHMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	Hayden	Overton
Ashurst	Coolidge	Johnson	Pittman
Austin	Copeland	Keyes	Pope
Bachman	Costigan	King	Radcliffe
Bailey	Couzens	La Follette	Robinson
Bankhead	Davis	Lewis	Russell
Barbour	Dickinson	Logan	Schall
Barkley	Dieterich	Loneragan	Schwellenbach
Bilbo	Donahay	Long	Sheppard
Black	Duffy	McAdoo	Shipstead
Bone	Fletcher	McCarran	Smith
Borah	Frazier	McGill	Steiwer
Brown	George	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Bulkeley	Gerry	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Bulow	Gibson	Maloney	Townsend
Burke	Glass	Metcalf	Trammell
Byrd	Gore	Minton	Truman
Byrnes	Guffey	Moore	Vandenberg
Capper	Hale	Murphy	Van Nuys
Caraway	Harrison	Murray	Wagner
Carey	Hastings	Neely	Walsh
Clark	Hatch	Norris	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, without going into the details of the two measures now under discussion—the Vinson bill and the Patman bill—I should like to confine my remarks to that phase which provides for the payment of the adjusted-service certificates. The essential difference between the two bills, as has already been stated, is that under the Vinson bill the Government must issue interest-bearing bonds to pay the certificates, whereas under the Patman bill it is proposed to issue non-interest-bearing Treasury notes. I shall give some figures which will illustrate more clearly than I can express in words the exact effect of these two different methods of paying the soldiers' bonus.

If the Vinson bill should be enacted and bonds should be issued to pay the certificates, assuming that, in round figures, the required amount is $2,200,000,000, and assuming also that the Government is able to finance that amount in bonds, and sell the bonds on a 3-percent basis—I put the rate low—the annual interest charge would be $66,000,000.

If these bonds should run for 20 years, the total amount of interest would be $1,320,000,000, and at the end of the 20 years the principal of the debt, namely, $2,200,000,000, would still be unpaid. Meanwhile the $66,000,000 per annum which would be required to pay the interest on the debt would have to be collected from the people by taxation.

If, on the other hand, non-interest-bearing Treasury notes should be issued to the amount of $2,200,000,000 and a sinking fund of $66,000,000 per annum should be provided, the equivalent of the 3-percent interest which would otherwise be paid on the $2,200,000,000 of bonds, such sinking fund, invested semiannually in 3-percent Government bonds, would, at the end of 20 years, equal the sum of $1,831,234,000.

If we engage in a brief example of subtraction, and deduct from the $2,200,000,000 the accumulations in the sinking fund of $1,831,234,000, we find we would in 20 years be short of paying the bonus by $368,766,000, in round figures.

If, on the other hand, a sinking fund of $81,000,000 per annum should be established and invested in Government bonds from time to time, or semiannually, at 3 percent, at the end of 20 years the entire sum of $2,200,000,000 would be completely extinguished. At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to the Patman bill to include a sinking fund adequate to retire this entire issue of Treasury notes over a period of 20 years.

Two questions arise about this method. One is the cry of inflation; the other is the cry of unsound money, or of "greenbacks", as they are called. I should like to deal with the greenback question first.

It is not necessary to go into the history of greenbacks. I doubt if everyone understands what the term "greenback" means. The term "greenback" simply means a character of currency issued by virtue of laws passed during the Civil War, and it was because the backs of the certificates were printed green that they were commonly called "greenbacks."

After all, whether we call them greenbacks or by any other term, contemptuous or otherwise, all the money in the United States today is greenback money. Look at any bill in your pocket and you will find it has a green back, and every one of those bills has behind it what? Gold? No. Specie? No. Then, what has it back of it? Every single dollar in this country today has back of it but one thing, that is, the honor and good faith of the American people.

What is back of a Government bond today? One thing—the good faith and honor of the American people. What is the difference between a bond and a Treasury note of the kind we seek to issue for the payment of this debt? The difference is simply this: If we issue bonds, as proposed under the Vinson bill, they will run for a definite term. A bond runs for a fixed term. Bonds are usually in denominations so large that they are not capable of being used as a circulating medium. The interest on a bond is paid to the investor from time to time. True, he can sell his bond, can convert it into currency. He could not sell his bond and convert it into gold. He could only convert it into the kind of money which the Government today authorizes to be used as a circulating medium in this country. He would be put to the disadvantage of converting his bond, perhaps at less than he paid for the bond, into currency of the smaller denominations which is effective and useful as a circulating medium among the people.

A bond, aside from being for a fixed term, has the attraction of returning income to the man who lends the Government the money. Currency or a Treasury note is a demand obligation; it is not a term obligation. It is a promise on the part of the Government of the United States to pay the holder thereof the amount represented by the certificate or the bill.

It is a non-interest-bearing obligation. No one has to pay interest because of the issuance of such notes.

Those who claim that these notes are inflationary, or that they are a menace to the credit of the Government, are simply expressing opinion. It is mere conjecture on their part to say that these notes are inflationary, or that a certain amount of additional issues on the part of the Treasury would affect the credit of the Government. It is also merely speculation on their part. I have yet to find the prescient mind that could tell me where inflation begins and where sound money stops and where deflation begins.

On one occasion when I was Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Act was under consideration I was called on by a committee of the most eminent bankers in the United States, who came to protest, with all their vigor—and they were quite vigorous about it—that the issuance of notes under the Federal Reserve System, the familiar Federal Reserve notes which we now carry in our pockets, would be inflationary; that they were fiat money; to use their exact expression, that they would "ruin the credit of the United States." Speeches were made upon the floor of the Senate at that time prophesying such dire results.

Mr. President, I said to these gentlemen, "I am very much interested in what you tell me about inflation. I do not know much about finance, and I am anxious to be informed. I happen to be a lawyer, and, as you know, we very frequently put witnesses under what we call 'the rule.' We send all of them out of the room except the one we want to examine in order that the other witnesses may not know that to which a previous witness has testified." I said, "Gentlemen, I invite you to an experiment. I will call into this room the best stenographer in the Treasury, and I will apply the rule; I will call you one at a time and ask you to give me a definition of inflation." They thought a moment, and said they would like to confer about it. After the conference they notified me that they did not care to make the experiment.

Mr. President, I want to emphasize that fact because the question as to what is inflationary and what is not is purely a matter of conjecture.

The question as to whether or not we must have a specie base or a gold base back of our money is also conjectural; and the best proof of that is that since we have gone off gold the American dollar is just as sound today as it was when gold was the basis.

I do not say that I am against a specie basis. I think it has a certain value and a certain restraining influence; but so long as government is intelligent and so long as we can restrain the exercise of our powers within the bounds of wisdom—it is always a question as to whether or not we can do so—gold, for instance, would not be necessary. But it is because we have not that confidence in ourselves or in the continuing judgment of every Congress that we find it necessary, or economists have always asserted it to be necessary, to have a specie basis for the money of the country. That, however, is not important to me, because we get into the realms of wide and controversial discussion when we take up that subject, and it is not necessary for the purpose I have in mind.

I think, after all, that the question we have here to consider is, What is wise in the circumstances of this case with respect to the conditions now existing and with respect to the general financial situation of the country? Those are the things which must determine our action. They must not be determined by theories or speculations or conjectures of economists or anyone else. We are charged with a responsibility of doing what we think is the sound and right thing to protect the credit of the American people and discharge an obligation of honor which we owe to the men who went out and fought the World War.

For my part, Mr. President, I am opposed to spending $1,320,000,000 more than is necessary to pay the bonus. That is the amount, as I said before, which would have to be paid in interest if we should issue 20-year bonds for this purpose. I am opposed to exacting from the taxpayers of this country, already overburdened, that much unnecessary money.

Why do we sell the bonds of our Government at par when they bear 2 $\frac{1}{8}$ - to 3-percent interest? We do it because our Government has a matchless credit. Why should we pay somebody \$1,320,000,000 over a period of 20 years for the privilege of using our matchless credit for the benefit of the men who went out and fought the World War? I cannot see any reason or justification for any such course, in spite of the theorists and the economists; or those who speak contemptuously of greenbacks, or those who say that this will injure the Government credit.

Let us examine that phase of the matter for a moment. I think that the issue of $2,200,000,000 of additional Treasury notes would affect the credit of this Government adversely, just as much as a spadeful of sand thrown upon the seashore would influence the incoming tide. I think there is no ground whatever for fear that the issuance of $2,200,000,000 of Treasury notes would affect the credit of the United States. On the contrary, I believe that it will have two desirable effects.

In the first place, I think it will be a great thing for this country if we settle now, and promptly, the controversial question as to the payment of the adjusted-service certificates. By this action we do that. We do that under either the Vinson or the Patman bill, for that matter.

But secondly, Mr. President, and more important, I think, is saving the money I have said we could save by issuing these Treasury notes and to make the test which I should like to see authorized by the American people, viz, whether or not there is sufficient foundation and soundness in the basis of our currency and of our credit in this country, to provide the necessary resilience which the increase of the currency by $2,200,000,000 will require, to prevent injury to the Government's credit. If we should take that course, we would put every economist and every theorist in this country to rout. We would gain a great advantage by making the experiment.

What has the present administration done since it came into power? It has of necessity engaged in making great experiments, and in conducting those experiments we have of necessity been obliged to blaze new trails. Here is a chance to blaze something of a new trail without doing the slightest injury to the credit of the country and without bringing upon ourselves any of the dangers or any of the evil consequences of so-called "inflation."

When I discussed Treasury notes I referred to the fact that they are noninterest bearing. I think that, in the minds of many people, a non-interest-bearing note is fiat money or inflationary, because it does not bear interest. Take any banker in America—or almost anyone, I will not say everyone—and almost any economist in America, and after discussing it with him you will find that he gets down to the question of interest. If he is honest he will tell you finally that since these do not bear interest there is no curbing feature about the issue which will make another Congress reluctant to engage in similar operations or go on with unlimited issues of Treasury notes.

So far as the latter statement is concerned, I wish only to say that the argument is always presented that while the proposal or a proposal may be sound, nevertheless we should not do it because it may be a temptation to a subsequent Congress to go still further. That would be a policy of negation if we adopted it. That would be a policy of legislative paralysis if we adopted it.

What we must have the courage to do, Mr. President, is to meet these issues squarely and with all the intelligence we can command, by performing our duty while we are here. We must leave to subsequent Congresses the duty to meet the situations which may develop during their existence. If they find it necessary to issue Treasury notes or bonds or anything else in order to meet the problems which may present themselves at that time, they will be responsible and must act in the light of conditions existing at the time. I hope, and I confidently believe, that they will be able to fully discharge their duty as every Congress and every Executive of the United States during its long history has been able to do when emergencies confronted him.

But the issue of notes, circulating notes, with interest on their face, would satisfy every demand of a bond, except so far as the fixed term of the note is concerned. A circulating note is necessarily a demand obligation, whereas a bond is necessarily a term obligation. But circulating notes bearing interest have been issued. They have been issued by the United States, and I have one here. It is a very interesting exhibit. Here is a $10 note. On its face it says:

Compound-interest Treasury note. Ten dollars. This note is legal tender for $10 in payment of all debts, public and private.

It bears 6 percent per annum. On the back of this note is the stated value at every 6-month period. It matured in 3 years. At the end of that time at compound interest this $10 was worth $11.94. Such notes were circulated, and successfully, during and after the Civil War. The note I show you is dated July 15, 1864.

That note, because of the interest-bearing feature, became invested with all the qualities of a bond, because the essential thing about a bond, and the only reason people buy it, is because of the interest or income they derive from it. But we do not have to issue interest-bearing currency any more. The credit of the Government does not require it. We shall issue, if we adopt the Patman bill, a conservative amount of the same kind of currency or Treasury notes as the one I have just exhibited, except that we are not going to let them bear 6-percent interest, or 1-percent interest, or interest of any kind. And at the end of 20 years they will be amortized by the sinking fund which is to be provided if the amendment I propose to offer shall be adopted.

Mr. President, I desire to say that so far as the metallic base is concerned, the Treasury statement which I have before me shows that on May 2 the total circulating medium in this country, outside of the circulating medium held in the Treasury, was only $4,300,000,000 and we have 125,000,000 people. The gold in the Treasury is $8,725,000,000. If our total note issue was increased to $6,500,000,000, we have $8,725,000,000 in gold in the Treasury—more than 100 percent of gold back of every dollar of currency that may be issued and outstanding.

It may be said, "Well, but we are off the gold standard." That is true. None of this gold can now be used for purposes of redemption; but that condition will not last always, and when the time comes to return to specie payments and it is necessary to redeem these obligations in gold, we shall be in position to redeem every dollar of currency now outstanding as well as the $2,200,000,000 of currency we shall issue to pay the bonus, and have over and above those obligations $2,225,000,000 in gold in the Treasury.

However, Mr. President, that is not the only thing we can do about the notes over a 20-year period if we should decide to amortize them over so long a time as that. In the financing of the Treasury there is always opportunity, on the part of a skillful head of the Department, especially in the circumstances now existing, to deal with such obligations as are now proposed. He may be able to redeem them more rapidly than the bill provides. There is nothing in the measure to prevent his doing that. He can take up such of this currency, and contract its circulation from time to time, as he may think necessary or desirable in the public interest.

I shall not go into a discussion of the many ways in which the circulation of the United States may be contracted or expanded, because the powers are ample; they are greater now than ever before in our history. I wish only to make clear that there is, in my opinion, no single element of danger of any sort, kind or condition in the issuance of the proposed currency with which to pay our obligation to the veterans of the World War.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. With great respect for the Senator's opinion on a subject of this nature, may I ask him whether, in his judgment, the same logic would apply to the payment of the $5,000,000,000 appropriation recently made?

Mr. McADOO. I think, to some extent, it would, but I do not think that we can finance, and I would never favor financing, every Government obligation with currency. Naturally, there is a limit to such a procedure. I may say further that I am absolutely opposed to issuing $1 of currency or of Treasury notes in order to make good deficiencies in the revenues of the Government. We must always impose sufficient taxation to take care of the ordinary expenditures of the Government. However, with emergency expenditures of such vast proportions, I think a new problem is presented, and that we cannot afford to issue currency to take care of all such obligations.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator distinguish between the two types of obligations solely on the basis that this is a maturing obligation and the other is a deficit? Let me put the question differently. Will the Senator state the limit to which he thinks it will be safe to proceed with the type of money which he now discusses and which obviously, within the existing limit, would justify what the Senator is saying? How far may we go?

Mr. McADOO. I will fix the limit if the Senator will tell me what inflation is. That is all conjecture; we can not draw a line there, of course. It is a matter of opinion—

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am asking for the Senator's opinion.

Mr. McADOO. As to how far we may go with the issuance of bonds, with the issuance of currency, or with both. That is a determination which must be made with the nicest judgment which can be brought to bear on the problem.

Speaking from my experience, having had charge of the finances of the Government for 6 years during a very serious time in our history, I do want to lay the specter of this conjectural inflation.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator has referred to the fact that he had charge of the finances of our country during the World War period. Did he at any time contemplate issuing Treasury notes or greenbacks for the expenditures of that period?

Mr. McADOO. I did not, because it was not necessary. I will state, for the information of my distinguished friend from North Carolina, that when we had to face the tremendous monetary demands which the war imposed upon us, not only to carry on our part of the war but also to give necessary financial assistance to those associated with us in the war, we figured that one-third of the money should be raised by taxation and that two-thirds of it might be raised by bond issues.

I will say further to the Senator, that if I had become convinced at any time—and chiefly because of inability to sell Government bonds to the American public—that the issuance of currency or of Treasury notes was essential to protect the interests of the Government, I should not have hesitated to adopt such a policy.

Mr. BAILEY. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. McADOO. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. It was not necessary, I take it, during the World War because the credit of the country was very good. Is that correct?

Mr. McADOO. That is a part of the story, of course.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator in the beginning of his speech stated that we had now a most extraordinary credit.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, we have. I dissent from the views that have been expressed on this floor by some eminent gentlemen, for whose opinions I have the greatest possible respect, that the credit of the United States is in any danger. I do not think it is. I do not think, however, that it is so expansive and so unlimited that we could do every kind of foolish thing that might be suggested to us; but, within the exercise of intelligence and judgment, the credit of the United States, in my opinion, is just as good today as it has ever been in its history. I should like to see, of course, as everyone else would like to see, a cessation of bond issues which impose a permanent burden on the American people that we would all be glad to escape; but I see no way by which we can avoid issuing bonds and imposing such taxation as may be required to meet the conditions which today confront us.

I desire to repeat that in every Congress it is the conditions existing at the time and the character of the problems to be dealt with, which must determine legislative and executive action.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator has testified that our credit now is just as good as it ever has been, and therefore the condition of the credit cannot be responsible for his argument that we should undertake to pay off this obligation with Treasury notes. What are the extraordinary conditions, therefore, that justify the procedure he is advocating?

Mr. McADOO. I regret very much that I have not been able to make clear to my distinguished friend the explanation which I gave at the outset of my speech. I said it was not necessary to issue interest-bearing bonds to pay the bonus; that if we should issue interest-bearing bonds it would only mean that we would have to pay $1,320,000,000 unnecessarily, which would have to be collected in taxation from the American people.

Mr. BAILEY. What are the extraordinary conditions now existing which the Senator would avoid with respect to the payment of this obligation? What is peculiar in the existing situation?

Mr. McADOO. I think there is something sufficiently striking in the situation, if the Senator will allow me to substitute the term "striking" for the word "peculiar" used by him, to convince everybody that we have been compelled to engage in tremendous expenditures in order to meet the emergency. For these emergency expenditures we have necessarily issued interest-bearing obligations. The time, in my opinion, has arrived when we should consider issuing such non-interest-bearing notes as are now proposed to take up the adjusted-service certificates held by our World War veterans.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator if there is not another striking difference between conditions existing and those which prevailed during the former experience of the Senator in that we now have an unprecedented amount of gold in the Treasury largely in excess of any currency issued against it, a condition which did not exist in the former day?

Mr. McADOO. I thank the Senator from Alabama for his observation. That is, of course, true. I have already alluded to the fact that we have a large gold reserve and that the issuance of $6,500,000,000 of currency against a gold reserve of $8,725,000,000—because, after all, this gold is held as a reserve against Government obligations—would not, in my mind, affect adversely the credit of this country or in any sense imperil its credit.

Mr. President, for the reasons I have imperfectly stated, I would prefer to see enacted the Patman bill rather than the Vinson bill. I think that in administration and execution it would be simpler, and I think it would bring swiftly to a conclusion the long-standing controversy about the soldiers' bonus. So far as the soldiers' bonus is concerned, I prefer to use the words "adjusted compensation", because it is a recognition of the fact that when a man served in the trenches of France for $1.25 a day and after the war was over happened to come back home alive we as a generous—

I will not say "generous", but as a "just" nation decided that service in the trenches in France, facing the enemy's gunfire and poison gases, was worth $2.50 a day. We therefore adjusted his compensation on that basis, not as a bonus but as a recognition of the higher value of the service which we had required him to perform.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. LONG. That was giving the soldier for fighting in the trenches, a sum merely equal to the lowest compensation paid to common labor during any similar time of the Nation's history, was it not?

Mr. McADOO. I think the Senator has understated the fact.

Mr. LONG. The commonest laborer was paid in excess of $2.50 a day during the World War.

Mr. McADOO. During the World War he was paid much more than that, I will say to the Senator from Louisiana. I think the compensation was more likely from $4 to $5 a day. I do not think we overpaid the soldier by giving him this adjusted compensation. I think that those who are opposed to the payment of adjusted compensation, because, they say, it anticipates the date of the maturity of the certificates, look at it from a technical point of view. As a legal question, we do not have to pay this adjusted compensation until 1945. On the other hand, when distress throughout the country has prevailed to such an extraordinary degree, and we are appropriating vast sums of money, billions of dollars, to relieve the distress of those who have no obligations from the Government in the form of certificates payable at any time, it is not unfair or unjust to say that we should be willing to anticipate the payment of those just obligations of the Government, and pay them now, especially when we can do it on a basis which will not impose a hardship on the American people, and which, in my humble opinion, will result in stimulating the return of prosperity to the country. I do not think it will bring prosperity all by itself, but in connection with other forces in operation and maturing now, I think that the payment to the World War veterans of their adjusted-service certificates, and in manner I have described, will be distinctly beneficial to the American people.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest that the Chair state the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended, which means the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the Vinson bill, for the Patman bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, those who vote for the Patman bill should vote "nay"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those who vote for the House bill, otherwise known as the "Patman bill", should vote "nay." Those who desire to vote for the committee amendment as amended will vote "yea." If the Vinson bill shall be adopted as an amendment, it will not be open to further amendment. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Borah	Connally	Frazier
Ashurst	Brown	Coolidge	George
Austin	Bulkley	Copeland	Gerry
Bachman	Bulow	Costigan	Gibson
Bailey	Burke	Couzens	Glass
Bankhead	Byrd	Davis	Guffey
Barbour	Byrnes	Dickinson	Hale
Barkley	Capper	Dieterich	Harrison
Bilbo	Caraway	Donahay	Hastings
Black	Carey	Duffy	Hatch
Bone	Clark	Fletcher	Hayden

Johnson	McKellar	Pittman	Thomas, Okla.
Keyes	McNary	Pope	Thomas, Utah

Loneragan	Murphy	Schwellenbach	Van Nuys
Long	Murray	Sheppard	Wagner
McAdoo	Neely	Shipstead	Walsh
McCarran	Norris	Smith	Wheeler
McGill	Overton	Steiwer	White

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I reannounce the absences of Senators as previously announced by me for the reasons given, which I ask may be ascribed to the present announcement as well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD at this point several paragraphs from the writings of John Stuart Mill, the writings of Professor Jevons, and of other economists on the question of what has been called here by financial writers and papers "fiat money", what it means, and what scholars who are recognized all over the world as experts on finance have said about the kind of money which is involved in the pending vote. Because of the different types of experts who have spoken on the subject throughout the country in the last few years, I ask to have these oldtimers' views printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The value of money is, to appearance, an expression as precise, as free from possibility of misunderstanding, as any in science. The value of the thing is "what it will exchange for"; the value of money is what money will exchange for—"the purchasing power of money." If prices are low, money will buy much of other things, and is of high value; if prices are high, it will buy little of other things, and is of low value. The value of money is inversely as general prices, falling as they rise and rising as they fall. (John Stuart Mill, Political Economy, book III, ch. 8.)

There is no such thing as intrinsic value. (Professor Jevons, Essay on Value of Gold.)

There cannot, in short, be "intrinsically" a more insignificant thing in the economy of society than money. (John Stuart Mill, Principles of Political Economy, vol. 2, p. 23.)

Mr. MacLeod, speaking of the expression "intrinsic value", says:

"This unhappy phrase meets us at every turn in economics, and yet the slightest reflection will show that to define value to be something 'external', and then to be constantly speaking of 'intrinsic' value are utterly self-contradictory and inconsistent ideas. Thus over and over again it is repeated in economical treatises that money has intrinsic value, but that a bill of exchange or bank note is only the representative of value.

"Money no doubt is the produce of labor, but, as Adam Smith observed, if it would exchange for nothing it would have no value; so, M. Say says, that the value of gold and silver consists only in what they will buy. How then can its value be intrinsic? How can anything have intrinsic value unless it has the thing it will exchange for 'inside itself'? 'Money has intrinsic value!' Has a piece of money got the merchandise, and all the other things it will purchase inside itself? Money will exchange for anything—corn, houses, horses, carriages, books, etc., and each of these is the value of the money with respect to that commodity. But which of these is its intrinsic value? The incongruity of these ideas is so glaring that it is only necessary to call attention to it for it to be perceived at once. 'Yet from the very beginning of the science this phrase has infested it.'

"Moreover, we see on considering the term 'value' that it is nonsense to speak of the 'representative' of value. Value is a 'ratio'—an external relation. What can be the 'representative of a ratio', or of an external relation? To say that money, because it is material and the product of labor, has intrinsic value, and that a bank note is only the representative of value, is just as absurd as to say that a wooden yard measure is 'intrinsic' distance, and that the space of 36 inches between two points is 'representative' distance. It is of the first importance to economic science to exterminate this unhappy phrase 'intrinsic value', which is clearly shown to be a contradiction in terms." (MacLeod, Theory and Practice of Banking, 1, 50.)

INFLUENCE OF COST OF PRODUCTION ON THE VALUE OF MONEY

In consequence of the great durability of gold, together with the fact that "nearly all the gold used as money is practically in the market at any given time", any change in the cost of production is likely to take a long time to produce its full effect on value. Hence the effects of all changes in the conditions of production of the precious metals are at first, and continue to be for many years, "questions of quantity only, with little reference to cost of production." (Henry Sidgwick, Principles of Political Economy, p. 250.)

Alterations, therefore, in the cost of production of the precious metals do not act upon the value of money except just in proportion as they increase or diminish its quantity. (John Stuart Mill, Political Economy, ch. 9, book 3.)

IT IS THE MONEY USE THAT GIVES VALUE TO GOLD

The fundamental cause of value in the precious metals is "their use as currency." This conclusion is not so obvious as it might appear. Up to recently ordinary political economists have been accustomed to accept Mr. Senior's dictum, that the measure of value in the precious metals is their use in the arts. It is very possible that this view is still accepted, notwithstanding the experience of the last 15 years, during which events have occurred which would, one might think, induce these people to reconsider their conclusion. (Thorold Rogers, professor political economy, Oxford University, Industrial and Commercial History of England, p. 324.)

Gold and silver owe almost the whole of their value to the fact that they can be converted into and used as money. If gold and silver were absolutely excluded from the currency of the world, their value would be greatly reduced, if it did not almost entirely cease to exist; and if either gold or silver were largely excluded from the currency of the world, the value of the metal so excluded would experience a very great fall.

The value of gold and silver is almost entirely due to their use as money, and consequently the relative value of gold and silver depends upon the extent to which the different nations of the world use these metals as currency. If one nation after another decided to demonetize silver and to sell the silver contained in its currency, the value of silver relatively to commodities and still more so in comparison to gold, could be made to fall to a very small fraction of its present value.

On the other hand, if the nations of the world demonetized gold, and sold their gold, the value of gold in relation to silver would experience a very great fall.

In short, we see that the demand for gold or silver is due mainly to the extent to which the legislatures of the different countries decided to use these metals as money, and, therefore, their relative value is and must continue to be regulated by legislation. (David Barbour, Metallic Money, ch. 2, p. 34.)

The value of money, other things being the same, varies inversely as its quantity; every increase of quantity lowering the value, and every diminution raising it in a ratio exactly equivalent. (John Stuart Mill, Political Economy.)

Alterations in the cost of the production of the precious metals do not act upon the value of money, except just in proportion as they increase or diminish its quantity. (John Stuart Mill.)

The value of money in any country is determined by the amount existing. That commodities would rise or fall in price in proportion to the increase or diminution of money, I assume as a fact that is incontrovertible.

We have seen, however, that even in the case of metallic currency the immediate agency in determining its value is its quantity. (John Stuart Mill, Principles of Political Economy, vol. 2, p. 89.)

There is plenty of evidence to prove that an inconvertible paper money, if carefully limited in quantity, can retain its full value. Such was the case with the Bank of England notes for several years after the suspension of specie payments in 1797, and such is the case with the present notes of the Bank of France. (Prof. Stanley Jevons.)

A well-regulated paper currency is so great an improvement in commerce that I should greatly regret if prejudice should induce us to return to a system of less utility. The introduction of the precious metals for the purposes of money may with truth be considered as one of the most important steps toward the improvement of commerce and the arts of the civilized life; but it is no less true that with the "advancement of knowledge and science" we discover that it would be "another improvement to banish them again from the employment to which, during a less enlightened period, they had been so advantageously applied." (Ricardo.)

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I desire to make one or two brief statements of fact, so that there may be no misunderstanding or misapprehension as to the vote about to be taken.

The question pending is the Patman bill. For that bill the Vinson bill is now pending as a proposed substitute. The vote comes upon the proposal to substitute the Vinson bill for the Patman bill. Therefore Senators who want to vote for the Vinson bill, as I understand, will vote "yea", and those who desire to vote for the Patman bill, as I understand, will vote "nay."

Second, if the Vinson bill should be passed, then the Vinson bill would not be subject to further amendment. On the other hand, if the Vinson bill should be defeated, it would leave the Patman bill pending before the Senate, and the Patman bill would then be open to further amendment. Am I correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to detain the Senate but a moment before the vote is taken.

After many parliamentary tribulations an issue has finally been drawn between those Senators who favor full payment of the bonus and those Senators who are primarily interested in the price of money and inflation, with the bonus as a secondary consideration.

I listened with great interest, as I always do and have ever since I have been in the Senate, to the instructive speech of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] on the question of inflation. I listened with very great interest to the newer contribution to this subject of the distinguished former Secretary of the Treasury, the present Senator from California [Mr. McAdoo].

Let me say, on behalf of the proponents of full payment of the bonus without any strings attached, that I do not now desire to express any opinion whatever as to the merits of the contention of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] or the Senator from California [Mr. McAdoo] on the question of inflation as exemplified by printing-press money. All I say is that this is a naked issue between those who favor the authorization by Congress of the full payment of the bonus and those who favor tying up the proposition of the payment of the bonus with an entirely separate, distinct, different, and highly controversial subject.

It is my understanding that if the bill to be passed by this Congress should be vetoed by the President of the United States, on the question of passing the bill over his veto the Vinson bill would be at least 6 or 8 votes stronger in this body than the so-called "Patman bill."

To my mind, if Senators are in favor of the payment of the bonus in full at this time, that should be done without any strings attached to it, and without the injection into the subject of any other controversial issue which may lose votes in the crucial test. Therefore, I agree with the parliamentary suggestion made by the Senator from Oklahoma that, on this roll call, Senators who are in favor of the payment of the bonus without any strings attached should, when their names are called, vote for the Vinson bill, and, therefore, vote "yea"; and the Senators who are in favor of inflation primarily, with the payment of the bonus in full as a secondary issue, and who are willing to subject that issue to the hazards which will necessarily follow, should vote for the so-called "Patman-Coughlin bill", and, therefore, vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. After this vote shall have been taken, should the Patman bill be adopted, there would be another vote on the passage of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair assumes that the Senator means, if the committee amendment as amended should be agreed to—in other words, if the Vinson amendment should be adopted—then there would be another vote on the final passage of the bill as amended. That is true.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry looking to information on the parliamentary status. If I correctly understood the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], should what we speak of as the Vinson bill, now tendered as an amendment by the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], be adopted, do I gather that the Vinson bill then could not be further amended? Would that vote prevent the Patman bill being tendered as a substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Vinson bill, the pending amendment, should be adopted, no further amendment would be in order. If the Vinson bill should be defeated, the vote would then occur upon the House bill, which would be open to amendment, provided the amendments were not such as had already been considered by this body.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, as amended. On that question, the yeas and nays have been demanded, and ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COUZENS (when his name was called). "Present." The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence, because of illness, of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. The Senator from Wyoming requests me to say that were he present and voting he would vote "yea."

I announce a pair between the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], who is unavoidably detained, and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], who is in the Virgin Islands on an official mission of the Senate, and announce that if present and voting the Senator from North Carolina would vote "nay", and the Senator from Maryland would vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to change my vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the necessary absence of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. FRAZIER. My colleague [Mr. NYE] is necessarily absent. He is paired on this question with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If the Senator from North Dakota were present he would vote "nay." I am not prepared to say how the Senator from Oklahoma would vote.

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 52, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee, as amended, was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the committee amendment, as amended, was rejected be reconsidered.

Mr. LONG. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. CLARK. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. AUSTIN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. AUSTIN. May the question be stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment, as amended, was rejected. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] moved that the vote by which the amendment was rejected be reconsidered. The Senator from Louisiana moved to lay that motion on the table. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. FRAZIER. My colleague the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] is absent. He is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] on this vote. If my colleague [Mr. NYE] were present, he would vote "yea." I am not prepared to say how the Senator from Oklahoma would vote were he present and voting.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] is absent on an official mission to the Virgin Islands.

I also announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is unavoidably detained, and that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained on important departmental business.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is necessarily detained.

So the motion of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma to reconsider was laid on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from California announced, during the course of his remarks, that he wished to offer an amendment. He should be given that opportunity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California is recognized to offer his amendment.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I regret that I have not had opportunity to perfect the amendment much as I should like to perfect it, but I will offer it as it is.

I move to insert at the appropriate place in the bill the following language:

A sinking fund of $81,000,000 to be included annually in the Budget, shall be and is hereby created, to be collected by taxation, and invested semiannually in bonds of the United States, the same to be used for the redemption of the Treasury notes herein and hereby authorized.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Committee on Finance gave no consideration to any such proposal as this, and I hope the question of taxes will not be involved in the so-called "Patman proposition."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as one of the friends of the Patman bill, I think I can say, and I believe most of my friends who have worked with me will join me in the statement, that we have no objection to this amendment. It would take away nothing, it would help the bill, and it would remove any flimsy pretext anyone might urge in an attempt to justify a vote against the bonus or a veto.

All the amendment of the Senator from California stipulates is that instead of paying 3 percent interest, the same amount, or thereabouts, shall be deducted every year and applied to the principal.

Those who have been so willing to have the Government pay 3-percent interest on this money certainly should not object now to the Government creating a sinking fund of 3 percent to retire the principal. The only difference is that if the amendment shall prevail, the interest alone will practically retire the Treasury notes, whereas under the previous proposition the whole amount would have been owing after the payment of interest for 20 years.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. If it is to arouse discussion, so far as I am concerned, I withdraw any objection to it, and the proponents of the legislation may have their way.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Louisiana will yield to me, I should like to ask the Senator from California a question.

As it passed the House, the bill provided for the retirement of Federal Reserve notes and Federal Reserve bank notes which are now a considerable portion of the circulating medium of the country. In testifying before the Committee on Finance the author of the bill, as it passed the House, stated it was the object, in order that there should be no inflation created by the printing of this two and a half billion dollars of paper money, that gradually the Federal Reserve notes and the Federal Reserve bank notes now in circulation would be withdrawn. I understand that the Senator's amendment contemplates the ultimate retirement of the Treasury notes to be issued in payment of the bonus. How does that harmonize with the provision of the bill which authorizes the retirement of all Federal Reserve bank notes and Federal Reserve notes now in circulation?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I suggest to the Senator from California that he modify his amendment by adding the words "not to exceed $81,000,000 annually."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I do not think the addition of those words will cure the situation. What I have in mind is the possibility, under the amendment of the Senator from California and under the language of the bill, of two kinds of currency going into retirement at the same time.

Mr. McADOO. I should like to know the Senator's understanding of the bill. What does the bill provide?

Mr. BARKLEY. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time call in the Federal Reserve notes and the Federal Reserve bank notes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I had not concluded. I have the floor, but I have yielded to permit this discussion to go on.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky, in carrying on his discussion with the Senator from California, had his back turned, and it was impossible to hear him.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I stated to the Senator from California that there seems to be some inconsistency between his amendment and the provision of the bill, which, as it passed the House, authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to retire the Federal Reserve notes and the Federal Reserve bank notes now in circulation; and they comprise about one-half, I believe, of the amount of money now in circulation. The Senator from California proposes to retire the Treasury notes authorized by the pending bill by the creation of a sinking fund of $81,000,000 per year. I am wondering whether, if both provisions go into effect, there would not be two classes of money going into retirement at the same time, if the Secretary of the Treasury should exercise the authority conferred upon him by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. McADOO. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that the provision of the bill as it passed the House with respect to the retirement of the Federal Reserve notes does not seem to be clear or adequate for the purpose; and I am proposing my amendment in order that there may be imposed by taxation a sufficient sum to create a sinking fund large enough to retire the Treasury notes issued to pay the bonus.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; that is what I am talking about.

Mr. McADOO. I think the matter will have to be ironed out and adjusted in conference, and I should prefer to have the amendment go into the bill in order that it may be taken up in conference.

Mr. BARKLEY. When a glaring inconsistency in a bill is called to the attention of the Senate, it is not always wise to leave it to a conference committee to work out.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from California to the fact that if his amendment shall be adopted, up to the present time it will be the only amendment put on the House bill, so there will not necessarily be any conference at all; and to adopt an imperfect amendment, admittedly imperfect, on the theory that it will be straightened out in conference, is to do so on a very violent assumption.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, assuming the floor in my right—

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, may I reply to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LONG. Yes; I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. McADOO. I may say to the Senator from Louisiana and to the Senator from Missouri that I shall ask permission to offer the amendment I have just proposed as a substitute for the provision in the present bill relating to the retirement of the Federal Reserve notes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator to withhold that amendment? As amended, the amendment provides not to exceed $81,000,000, and that leaves no conflict, I may state to the Senator from California.

Mr. McADOO. I have accepted that suggestion.

Mr. LONG. That having been done, there need be nothing further done. There is no inconsistency between the Senator's amendment, as amended, and the pending bill. The House can concur in the amendment, and the bill will be perfectly good.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator may be too cocksure about that matter.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, does the Senator from Kentucky wish me to yield to him?

Mr. BARKLEY. If he has the floor.

Mr. LONG. What does the Senator wish to say?

Mr. BARKLEY. I was remarking that I think the Senator is too cocksure about the perfection and consistency of these two provisions.

Mr. LONG. No, Mr. President; I never am too cocksure. I am always very conservative.

Mr. BARKLEY. I know that is the Senator's assumption, but there are others who may have a different judgment about the matter.

Mr. LONG. I am always sure of what I say, and the Senator can always depend on what I tell him.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator may feel that his judgment is superior. However, the amendment of the Senator from California deals with the Treasury notes which are to be issued as a result of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The provisions of the bill to which I referred a moment ago authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to call in Federal Reserve notes and Federal Reserve bank notes, which are entirely different kinds of money from that provided to be issued under the bill.

Mr. LONG. That does not hurt a thing on earth. The money is still just as sound as a dollar. The only thing the amendment of the Senator from California does is to provide that there shall be levied taxes not to exceed $81,000,000 to be used as a sinking fund to retire the particular two and one-quarter billion dollars issued to pay the bonus.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that; but the Secretary of the Treasury may at the same time be retiring two and a half billions of dollars of Federal Reserve notes and Federal Reserve bank notes.

Mr. LONG. I know; but we are not worried about whether he does it or not.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the time comes, the Senator may be worried.

Mr. LONG. Oh, no; we shall not be worried.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Aside from any question of merit involved in the amendment of the Senator from California, it occurs to me that it may contravene the constitutional provision which requires that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House.

Mr. LONG. Did not this bill originate in the House? The bill we are now voting on is the Patman bill.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President—

Mr. LONG. I shall yield to the Senator from California as soon as the Senator from Arkansas has completed his question.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield so that I may answer his question?

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I think I can clarify the question in a moment.

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. In answer to the question of the Senator from Louisiana, it is certainly true that the Patman bill originated in the House of Representatives; but the Patman bill is not a revenue bill, and the inhibition in the Constitution is against the origination of revenue bills in the Senate. I do not think the question which I have raised calls for a prolonged argument. It is true that the amendment does not provide for an actual tax, but it does require a sinking fund to be raised by taxation; and that, I think, constitutes a revenue bill within the meaning of the constitutional provision.

Mr. LONG. I desire to say before yielding to the Senator from California that the amendment does not make this bill a revenue bill. The amendment does not impose any tax at all. The bill came along as a currency measure to pay the soldiers' bonus and remains a currency measure.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The amendment does require a sinking fund to be raised by taxation.

Mr. LONG. The Senator, however, knows that it is not a revenue bill. The only revenue bill in the world would be a bill which actually levied a tax.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I do not think that is true.

Mr. LONG. Well, that is the law. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair requests visitors in the gallery to maintain order. The visitors in the gallery will kindly refrain from laughter. The Senate is trying to transact business in an orderly fashion, and the Chair asks those in the gallery to refrain from laughter or audible conversation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will not ask the Senator to yield.

Mr. LONG. I simply desire to say that the suggestion has been made to me by the Senator from Georgia that the taxes which have already been raised could be used, or Congress could later be asked to raise other revenue. There is no revenue-taxing measure except that which actually imposes taxes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California [Mr. McAdoo] has been trying to have the Senator from Louisiana to yield to him.

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I think there is some force in the point raised by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas. As I do not wish to complicate the bill, I think, on the whole, perhaps it will be wiser to withdraw the amendment; and I do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California withdraws his amendment. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I am a little puzzled about this question, and I should like to find out about it from the Senator from California [Mr. McAdoo], who was once Secretary of the Treasury, or from any other Senator who has knowledge thereof. Never before in the whole history of the Federal Reserve System was the Secretary of the Treasury authorized to withdraw Federal Reserve notes.

Mr. McADOO. During my tenure of that office he had no such authority.

Mr. GLASS. He never had any such authority. It seems to me the bill should provide that the banks which comprise the Federal Reserve System should withdraw the notes if they are to be withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. AUSTIN. I repeat the announcement formerly made with respect to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is unavoidably detained, and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] is absent on an official mission to the Virgin Islands. I announce a special pair between these two Senators. I am authorized to state that were the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] voting he would vote "yea"; if the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] were voting, he would vote "nay."

I announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who is detained on important departmental business.

I also announce the absence of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], caused by illness. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK (after having voted in the negative). I desire to change my vote from "nay" to "yea", and I should like to make the statement that I do it only for the purpose of moving a reconsideration. Since it is apparent that the Patman bill cannot pass over the Presidential veto, I desire to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill will apparently be passed and hope Senators may reconsider their vote on the matter. Therefore I change my vote from "nay" to "yea" for the purpose of moving reconsideration.

Mr. FRAZIER. I wish to announce a pair on this question between my colleague the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] were present, he would vote "yea." I am not informed as to how the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] would vote if present.

The result was announced—yeas 55, nays 33, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I desire to give notice of my intention to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had appointed Mr. MERRITT of New York a member of the committee on the part of the House, to attend the funeral of the late Senator CUTTING, of New Mexico, vice Mr. BLANTON, resigned.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. J. Res. 273. Joint resolution extending the gratitude of the Nation to Admiral Byrd, and to the members of his expedition; and

H. J. Res. 274. Joint resolution authorizing the appointment of a special joint committee to meet with other representatives of the Government in greeting Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd, upon his return from his second Antarctic expedition.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 147. An act to alter the amount apportioned to certain States for public-employment offices affiliated with the United States Employment Service;

S. 613. An act to add certain public-domain land in Montana to the Rocky Boy Indian Reservation;

S. 707. An act to amend the act of May 19, 1926, entitled "An act to authorize the President to detail officers and enlisted men of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to assist the governments of the Latin-American Republics in military and naval matters"; and

S. 2145. An act extending the time for repayment of the revolving fund for the benefit of the Crow Indians.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 470, being Senate bill 2357, to amend the Tennessee Valley Authority Act.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I should like to dispose of a matter first. Will the Senator from Nebraska withhold that motion for just a moment? I want to dispose of a matter relating to the bill which was just passed. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has moved, or, rather, has given notice of his intention to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed. Under the rules of the Senate that notice could prevail for several days without action. Therefore, I now move—

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. The Senator from Louisiana cannot do that, because there is a motion now pending before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a motion before the Senate, being the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska temporarily withdraw his motion so we may dispose of my motion?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator evidently is going to make a motion to lay on the table a certain motion which has not as yet been made.

Mr. LONG. No; I am going to do more than that. I am going to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed in the hope that my friend the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] will move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. There will be plenty of time to do that after my motion shall have been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no desire to have measures come in conflict so far as procedure is concerned. I have been very anxious to have considered by the Senate a joint resolution which was reported out by the Finance Committee having to do with the extension of the N. R. A. May I ask the Senator how long he expects his measure will occupy the time of the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. So far as I know, the bill will not occupy much of the time of the Senate. I do not know of any extended discussion that will take place with reference to it.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know that there is any opposition at all to the Senator's bill. Unfortunately I have not had time to consider it. If there is going to be any action taken with reference to the N. R. A. legislation, the Senate must proceed with it at a very early date because the present law relating to the N. R. A., as the Senator knows, will expire on June 16. The measure has not as yet passed the House; the House is in fact waiting for some action on the part of the Senate before they take it up. Unless it would greatly inconvenience the Senator or unless there is some particular reason for the immediate passage of the proposed legislation he has in charge, I very much hope he will permit us to go forward with the N. R. A. joint resolution and get it out of the way.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not urge that joint resolution this afternoon. My attitude toward the joint resolution will be determined by some facts which I think I can secure from the Senator from Mississippi, and I should like to talk with him before the consideration of the measure begins.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, in the event the debate should be prolonged with reference to the measure which the Senator from Nebraska has in charge, would he not then temporarily lay it aside in order to permit the Senate to take up the one to which I have referred?

Mr. NORRIS. I should be willing to lay it aside temporarily if I could be assured that what the Senate would take up would not be long delayed. I have no disposition to interfere with the passage of the Senator's joint resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. I can only give the Senator the assurance that I very much hope it will not take very much time. We have suggested the matter, and a good many of us have gotten together on a proposition in order to save debate. I do not think it is going to take a great deal of time, but I do not know.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think the joint resolution can be passed this afternoon?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I do not.

Mr. NORRIS. Then let us go ahead.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORRIS. I first yield to the Senator from Mississippi to complete his statement.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely desire to finish my inquiry. Then, as I understand, if the Senate should take up this proposed legislation this afternoon, the Senator from Nebraska would be quite willing to lay it aside temporarily if he could get some assurance that there would not be protracted debate on the proposed N. R. A. legislation?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; if protracted debate should take place on the bill I am trying to get up, and if I could be assured that we could dispose of the joint resolution in a short time, I should not have any objection.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator about how long he thinks his bill will take?

Mr. NORRIS. So far as I know, I do not think it will take very long. Personally, I do not know any objection to it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I should like to say that I should be very glad to call up the N. R. A. joint resolution immediately following the consideration of the Senator's proposal.

Mr. WAGNER (and other Senators) addressed the Chair. The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi, the Chairman of the Finance Committee, on what theory he thinks that the so-called "N. R. A. legislation" should have preference over a bill equally, if not more, important, particularly to the working people of the country in view of present economic conditions? I refer to the national labor relations bill, which was reported by the Committee on Education and Labor prior to the report by the Committee on Finance of the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Mississippi. The National Labor Relations Board, which was created under Public Resolution 44, also expires on June 16 if no action is taken by Congress; and that Board seems to me most important in achieving or retaining industrial peace in this country. I do not think there will be a very prolonged debate upon this matter. I ask the Senator from Mississippi to give precedence to the national labor-relations bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not think I should want to yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield further.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont will state it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is the pending question debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then, when the Senator resumes his seat I think I shall desire to debate the question.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to answer the question of the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from New York has called attention to the bill which he reported from his committee. I have given no study to that bill, and know of it only in a general way. I must say to the Senator that while the board which administers section 7 (a) under the N. R. A. was created by an act of Congress after we had passed the N. R. A. bill, I am sure the committee in dealing with that matter overlooked that fact. I had hoped that when the N. R. A. joint resolution came before the Senate an amendment would be adopted which would extend the life of that Board to the life of the N. R. A. I think that should be done.

So far as the proposal of the Senator from New York is concerned, however, I do not think it ought to have precedence over the proposed N. R. A. legislation, because whatever is done must be done by June 16, and there is a great deal of uncertainty in the country as to just what we are going to do about the extension of the N. R. A.

Mr. GLASS and Mr. WAGNER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. The Senator from Nebraska has yielded the floor. The Chair understands that a matter of importance, which is privileged, coming over from the House of Representatives, must have attention at once, and therefore recognizes the Senator from Virginia to call up a privileged matter.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I rise for a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WAGNER. In case the proposed T. V. A. legislation referred to by the Senator from Nebraska should be taken up for consideration, I wish to ask the Chair whether it could be laid aside for the consideration of another matter only by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It could be laid aside. It is not as yet before the Senate for consideration. The Senator from Nebraska has moved to make it the unfinished business. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] has given notice that he desires to debate that question. When the bill is before the Senate, if the Senate shall take it up, the Senate can lay it aside temporarily to consider any other business it desires to consider.

Mr. WAGNER. But laying aside the unfinished business can be done only by unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator states the situation correctly.

Mr. BORAH. It can be laid aside by vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; any other measure can be substituted by vote for the measure which the Senator from Nebraska is seeking to bring before the Senate.

Mr. WAGNER. I thank the Chair.

REAR ADMIRAL RICHARD E. BYRD

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 273) extending the gratitude of the Nation to Admiral Byrd and to the members of his expedition was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd and the members of the second Byrd Antarctic expedition are returning home from a successful and heroic exploration of Antarctic lands, wherein they have extended our knowledge of this vast area by airplane flights, tractor, and dog-sled trips, making extended and valuable scientific observations; and

Whereas the members of the expedition have displayed a courage and devotion worthy of the highest traditions of American exploration, and an unswerving loyalty to the superb leadership of their commander; and

Whereas Rear Admiral Byrd has added another notable chapter to the annals of American expeditions by his genius in organizing, transporting, and providing for the subsistence of his men while they carried on a program of research in 22 branches of science under the most adverse conditions, and he personally displayed exceptional gallantry in his lone vigil away from the Little America base in order to make important meteorological observations: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the gratitude of the Nation be extended to Admiral Byrd and to the members of his expedition, and that a copy of this resolution be appropriately inscribed and presented to him and to each member of the second Byrd Antarctic expedition.

The joint resolution was considered by unanimous consent, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and unanimously passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate another joint resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 274) authorizing the appointment of a special joint committee to meet with other representatives of the Government in greeting Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd upon his return from his second Antarctic expedition was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That a joint committee of Congress to be composed of 5 Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and 5 Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, accompanied by the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives, is authorized to join with other officials and representatives of the Government in greeting Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd upon his arrival at the navy yard on May 10, 1935.

The joint resolution was considered by unanimous consent, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and unanimously passed.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Chair is entirely too fast for me, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] was too slow.

Out of an excessive desire to be accommodating to Senators, although I had privately asked the Chair for recognition, I agreed to let the Senator from Mississippi bring up a question for precedence before the presentation by the Senator from Nebraska of his proposition—not that I had any less desire to oblige the Senator from Nebraska, but only because the Senator from Mississippi had made the request, and the Senator from Nebraska had not.

I do not suppose it is worth while now to discuss the joint resolutions which the Senate has unanimously passed; but, as the senior Senator from Virginia, I had desired to say something in behalf of the joint resolutions. In my own view, however, that is entirely unnecessary. Every Senator knows of the heroism of Richard Evelyn Byrd. I had simply proposed to read a few extracts from the attestation of the scientist who was second in command of the Byrd expedition as to Admiral Byrd's extraordinary and superhuman heroism.

The joint resolutions have passed, however; and I shall not consume the time of the Senate in doing something which is rather superfluous, beyond saying that I have known the Byrds for the 76 years of my life—77, to be exactly accurate—and Dick Byrd comes from a stock that could not help being heroic if they wanted to, noted not only for their peculiarly fine intelligence but also for their extraordinary courage in every emergency.

If I may have unanimous consent to incorporate in these few remarks the attestation made by Thomas C. Poulter, chief scientist and second in command of the expedition, of Admiral Byrd's unparalleled courage and heroism, I shall terminate my remarks on the subject. I ask unanimous consent to incorporate Mr. Poulter's tribute.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times]

ADMIRAL BYRD'S SOLITARY VIGIL: A DRAMATIC TEST OF COURAGE—AWAY FROM HIS PARTY FOR FOUR AND A HALF MONTHS, HE UNDERWENT A SEVERE ORDEAL

[The second Byrd Expedition maintained on the Ross Ice Shelf the farthest south weather station ever established. Here Admiral Byrd lived alone through the long winter night. The story of his vigil, which tested his strength and courage, is told in the following article:]

(By Thomas C. Poulter, Chief Scientist and Second in Command, Byrd Expedition)

LITTLE AMERICA, ANTARCTICA.—Our arrival at Commander Byrd's advance-base weather station at the southernmost and coldest spot ever inhabited by man marked the end of a horrible ordeal endured by a man alone, cut off from human aid by a code that he refused to break.

Though for 2 months three of us lived there with our commander, jammed together in his 9-by-13 room, we learned next to nothing from him of his experience, for he told us no more than bare courtesy required. I had expected this, for I knew that the many thousands who heard him lecture on his last expedition were struck by the fact that not once did he mention himself. Therefore, when he writes of this expedition, he will, I am sure, as is his custom, omit the part he played. That his experience may not be entirely lost, I have consented to write this article for the New York Times.

When we first saw him, on August 10, we were shocked at his appearance. Emaciated, hollow-cheeked, weak, and haggard though he was, he met us casually, calmer by far than any of us. "Hello, fellows," he said, as if he had seen us only yesterday, but his ghastly condition and husky voice told us that, in spite of this matter-of-factness, he had been through some terrific things. When I learned that his condition had been even worse and that his most desperate time had been many weeks before our arrival, in the very middle of the winter night, I realized dimly what his battle for survival must have been.

Since that time I have been collecting here and there the pieces that go to make a consecutive story of his trials. Some I have gathered from casual remarks he has dropped from time to time in conversation or in the discussion of his cold-weather problems. Some I have from his old friend Murphy, who received and handled his radioed instructions, and still more from his record, a part of which I had a chance to read. Putting the pieces together I discovered that I have come upon something rare. It is a picture of a mighty trial of manhood and spirit and reveals something of Byrd the man.

PEACEFUL SOLITUDE

It appears that for the first weeks of his isolation the commander enjoyed himself immensely. In fact, he found an indescribable tranquillity in his solitude. He welcomed the hardships and strenuous physical labor imposed by his environment, an environment strange almost beyond conception. He was cut off for a period from life and the sun and most of the familiar things of civilization as completely as if he had been on the dead silent and eternally dark side of the moon. Could any man alone keep his mental balance under such conditions? That danger was one of the gravest he faced.

The commander, however, did not view it with alarm, afterward. Having met the hazard with equanimity, he expressed his opinion that any average man could do the same. With this I disagree. When he had successfully passed nearly half of the winter nights the clouds of disaster loomed suddenly. He was stricken down by poisoning from the combined fumes of his improvised oil stove and the gasoline engine powering his radio generator.

Oil had to be used instead of coal because the lateness of the season prevented more than one trip to the advance base and coal was too heavy to carry. This had necessitated the improvising of an oil burner from an ordinary caboose-type coal stove. When the disaster occurred Byrd had been living in his little room three and a half months and had from the beginning been breathing in and gradually absorbing the poisonous fumes of his faulty stove.

On May 31, at the end of a radio schedule, he went into the snow tunnel to shut off the engine and was knocked dizzy by the fumes of the exhaust. Later he found that the vent had been clogged with ice. He was quite ill that night. The next day about supper time he found himself in a critical condition. Apparently the incident of the previous day had lowered his resistance to a point where his system had finally succumbed to the effects of the fumes from the heater buried under the snow.

WROTE OUT INSTRUCTIONS

III, alone, helpless in the middle of the winter night with 3 months of darkness and killing cold facing him, survival seemed impossible, so in the dim light of a candle, with fingers numb from cold, he lay in his bunk and calmly wrote out instructions for his leaders.

Instructions ended with the statement, "Don't worry, carry on normally and go as far as you can in carrying out the scientific program, but put the lives of my men first. Do what you can for Ellsworth." These notes written on loose white sheets he tied on a string and hung from a nail in the wall over his bunk, and there they were when we arrived months later, but yellowed as time yellowed paper. Two days after he was stricken down he got in touch with Little America by radio, but said nothing of his condition. For weeks he was on the thin edge. For relief all he had to do was to tap out on the radio three letters, S O S, and every man at Little America would have volunteered to rush to his aid with three tractors along a known trail. He would have been reached probably without casualty, possibly at the cost of some man's life or limb.

KEPT RADIO GOING

Indeed, he went much further than his refusal to call for help, and in so doing lessened his chances for survival. Time and again he exhausted the slender reserve of strength he had struggled so desperately to gain in order to keep radio contact. After his engine broke down, he had to hand-crank the generator. He knew that, in spite of his instructions to the contrary, his men at Little America would have fought through to him had radio communication with him suddenly ceased. He does not talk of this but the facts show his reasoning. Indeed he even tapped out jokes on his telegraph key to throw Murphy off the track.

His most dangerous enemies were cold and fumes. He could avoid the cold only at the price of absorbing poison fumes. The incredible odds demanded all the concentration of his trained mind. He was so weak that he had to creep and was unable at times to eat. He apparently faced inevitable defeat, but not for a moment could he, nor did he, cease fighting.

In order to lessen the fumes he had to endure an unbelievable amount of cold. He had his stove out 14 hours out of the 24. The temperature was once 80 degrees below zero and often ran 20 degrees colder than that at Little America. He suffered much pain in various parts of his body where the poison settled, especially in the head and eyes. His stomach was affected so that he had to force himself to eat. For weeks he could not read and to such a degree he had to husband his strength that at times he dared not risk cranking the phonograph. Pain made sleep difficult.

Throughout all this his devotion to his purpose was shown by the completeness of his auroral and weather observations. Aside from the visual observations necessary, there were four recording clock-driven mechanisms constructed for bitter cold-weather operations. These had to be kept in running condition. He measured these instruments and kept his record with the meticulous care of a trained observer.

The records are valuable to the science of meteorology and well worth while from the practical standpoint because meteorological observations in Antarctica are leading the way to more reliable world weather forecasting. That knowledge of Antarctic weather is essential to successful long-range forecasting, not only for the southern hemisphere but for the world in general.

SOLITUDE NECESSARY

Little America is on the seacoast, hence Byrd's inland weather station was necessary and important. It had to be a one-man station for psychological reasons; for two men to live together under such conditions was out of the question. Temperamental harmony would have been an impossibility, and even if the persons had been congenial and adaptable there was no use in subjecting more than one to the hazard of being cut off from a doctor.

Again the station was established too late in the season to stock it with supplies sufficient for 3 men, so Byrd himself undertook the lonely vigil. This was in line with his rule not to order anyone to do what he himself will not do. I have attempted to visualize the period when he could not read, lying there suffering in his bunk in the inky blackness of his buried room. The bitter cold must have bitten bone deep. He does not tell us how he endured the monotony, the silence, and the utter loneliness. He did, however, let drop on one occasion that for weeks he faced the possibility that the next day he would lack the strength to get his food and fuel out of the snow tunnels.

REPLY TO A REQUEST

But these facts came afterward, we did not know them at Little America. I did not know them when I requested his permission to make a tractor journey to the advance base with the benefit of improving twilight of late July for meteor observations. His disarming reply to this request said: "I approve the trip only on condition that you can make it without undue risk to the men on the first attempt."

We turned back half-way short of the advance base in obedience to his strictly worded safety precautions. When we did reach the advance base in August we were scarcely 2 weeks ahead of the sun. His need for aid had passed. He had fought it out alone and wholly within himself in June and, in spite of recurring periods of weakness, he was once more struggling uphill.

I don't know of anything finer than that in life or literature. The odds were so overwhelmingly against him that he should rightfully have lost his fight. Had he done so his chivalrous regard for us would have been only too evident. It is natural that he should have our deep gratitude for what he endured and for his willingness to face the supreme sacrifice in his thoughtfulness for our safety.

CONDITION OF THE COTTON-TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, all of us who have been working for a solution of the very serious condition existing in the textile industry are pleased that the commission appointed by the President has started immediately to investigate the situation, and is now getting reports from people who, from their association with the industry, are in a position to present all the facts. Undoubtedly, after its study it will make recommendations promptly to the President as to what can be done for the industry.

While recognizing that the situation in the textile industry is most alarming, we should not forget the work that was done for this industry by the N. R. A. Before its establishment the wages which were being paid in some textile mills were extremely low—a mere pittance in many cases. The establishment of a minimum wage was a life saver to those who were employed in some of the cotton mills. There is no telling what would have happened long ago if the code in this industry had not been adopted.

From various parts of my State complaints have come to me as to the condition which now exists, and remedies have been suggested and suggestions made as to what might be done for the restoration of the industry.

Before calling attention to these suggestions, I desire to point out briefly the development of the industry. It had its beginning in New England, with the establishment of the Slater mill in Rhode Island, and gradually became ceptered in New England, where there was an abundance of water supply, the necessary capital, and sufficient help that could be trained to operate the machinery. The industry grew until in 1923 there was a total of 19,000,000 spindles in place in New England, and 433,000 looms, and the industry was employing close to 500,000 persons.

While cotton manufacturing was taken up in the South after the War between the States, it was not until the early 1900's that it really began to be an appreciable factor. Undoubtedly the profits made during the World War enabled the cotton manufacturers in the South to become well established, and since 1923 there has been a steadily increasing liquidation of New England mill property, so that in December 1934, the spindles had decreased from 19,000,000 to 10,400,000, and with less than 7,000,000 of these in operation. In the South there was an increase from 16,000,000 spindles in 1923 to 19,000,000 in 1934, and of the 19,000,000, 7,500,000 were active. There is no question in my mind that the movement of the industry from New England to the South was due to lower wages, longer hours of operation, the nearness to the raw material, and an absence of restrictions that existed in the North.

A better measure than that shown by the number of spindles in operation is the number of hours the spindles have been operated during any one year. In the years 1923-24 the production, in terms of spindle hours, was as follows: 50,599,000,000 in the cotton-growing States, 30,102,000,000 in the New England States, and 3,659,000,000 in all other States, or a total of 84,360,000,000.

In 1933-34 the hours of production in favor of the South were very much greater—59,338,000,000 in the cotton-growing States, 19,309,000,000 in the New England States, and 1,836,000,000 in all other States, or a total of 80,483,000,000. These figures show that the cotton-goods production, and therefore the probable consumption, is today only slightly below what it was in 1923-24, and a return to more normal conditions in the country would undoubtedly increase the production figures to at least the 1923-24 level.

The cotton-textile code, through its standard work week of 40 hours, has changed this relation somewhat, but the figures for 1933-34 still show a much greater number of hours having been run for the average southern spindle than for the average northern spindle, the southern spindle averaging 256 hours per month, and the northern spindle 150 hours per month.

Prior to the code, the average number of hours operated in the southern section of the industry was approximately 55 hours a shift, the legal limitations varying from 54 to 60 hours a shift. The average hours operated in the North were much shorter, due to the legal limitation of 48 hours a week in Massachusetts, where nearly half of the New England spindles were located. In addition to this tremendous advantage of longer hours, the South paid a much lower wage per week than was paid in the North.

One of the troubles with the cotton textile industry has been the method of operation, which has led to overproduction. Since the World War there has been either actual overproduction or potential overproduction which has been quite consistent at all times. This condition became increasingly aggravated during the late twenties, due to more and more mills operating on double shifts to lower their overhead costs. At the time the Cotton Textile Code was adopted it was estimated that perhaps half of the industry was running on a double shift. In drafting the Code, data for the previous 11 years seemed to indicate that the industry could meet all requirements for production on an average of 60 hours of production a week. The committee contemplated the operation of certain parts of the industry requiring volume goods at 80 hours a week, while other parts were to operate 40 hours a week. In practice this did not work out, as with the exception of approximately 75 mills out of 1,200, the industry immediately attempted to operate 80 hours a week, leading to conditions of overproduction. The mills cannot afford to carry the large stocks resulting, and in consequence the market is constantly being flooded with "distress" goods, which set the market price.

In addition to this basic trouble of overproduction, there are three factors that enter more or less prominently into bringing about the situation which exists, certainly as far as New England is concerned.

Many complaints about the processing tax have come to me. Those in a position to know say that it is a burden that is too great for the industry to bear. They state that it is a sales tax; that the tax is heaviest on the lower-priced necessities of cotton clothing, being assessed against the manufacturer; it actually pyramids between the manufacturer and the ultimate consumer. It undoubtedly has resulted in curtailed consumption of cotton goods, due to the upsetting of the price relationship between cotton goods and competing products.

It is no answer to say that the burden of the processing tax falls equally on the northern and southern mills. An additional weight placed on a boat loaded to the gunwales will sink the boat. The same weight would endanger, but not sink, a boat less heavily burdened. The market cannot endure the additional weight of this tax. Nor is it an answer to the problem to say, "Raise the price of cotton goods." Market prices are set by the mills paying low wages, and cannot be raised by edict or agreement.

On one hand, the industry has lost to the paper-bag trade and the jute trade in bags, and on the other end of the price scale it has lifted the prices of finer cottons over the price of rayon. Over the entire range of cotton goods the processing tax has, in combination with the higher N. R. A. costs, put the cost of cotton goods to the consumer at a level so high that consumer resistance to prices has cut down consumption. While the processing tax hurts all cotton mills, it is more burdensome to the northern than to the southern mills. This is due to the fact that in the South the products are principally coarse and medium goods, whereas in the North the principal products are the fine and fancy goods. The finer the product, the longer cotton remains in process, and in consequence the longer the time before the mill can hope to collect from customers the money already spent in processing taxes. As an indication—on some fine goods it takes up to 4 months to weave out a warp, making the total time between the opening of the cotton and the collection of the tax from the customer 7 or 8 months.

The volume of cotton-textile exports has never been large in comparison with domestic production, and accounted for approximately 7 percent of the domestic production. Due to the increased cost under the N. R. A. it became increasingly difficult to export cotton goods because of the price situation. The markets which we had, particularly in the Philippines and in Cuba, have been lost. In the reciprocal treaty negotiated by the State Department with Cuba the cotton textiles were apparently overlooked.

The second factor which has a bearing upon the situation, and which must be watched closely, is the matter of importation. The tendency shown to large increases of imports from Japan must be watched and undoubtedly checked. Imports from Japan increased from 30,000 square yards in January 1934 to 2,209,825 square yards in December 1934; and the figures in 1935 show an even greater increase: January, 4,545,710 square yards, and February, 10,289,433 square yards.

The important point, however, is that the bulk of the goods imported from Japan are bleached fabrics, and on the basis of the first 2 months of the year comprise approximately 25 percent of the goods of that type made in America. While these goods are not a large percentage of the production of cotton goods, nevertheless they are a large percentage of this class of goods, and therefore, because of this, the importation is very harmful and undoubtedly has its effect on the sale price. Apart from the importations already received the Japanese are at the present time actively seeking new business in this country.

To my mind, the most important question which exists in the cotton industry, is that of the differential in wage rates between the North and South. The southern textile worker failed to establish for himself a wage equal to that paid in the North. The low wages were used as a bait to attract industry to the far South. Capital, faced with the difference in paying wages, has sought the cheaper labor in the South. In that section, the endeavor was to make the employees work for a wage which paralleled that previously prevailing in the textile mills in the North. There is an entirely wrong popular conception as to this wage difference under the textile code; that it is merely the difference between the minimum of $12 for the South and $13 for the North. The real difference lies in the wages paid to the vast army of skilled and semiskilled workers—a difference which averages not $1 but $2.56; a difference between bare subsistence and a modest living; a difference between no margin of purchasing power and an opportunity to buy some of the products of industry; a difference which means that competition cannot longer endure.

Even this latter average does not give the true picture. The average is affected by the wages paid in two southern States, which are higher than other sections of the South. For a true comparison, consider the following figures given to me of the pay, at the same time, of two individual mills making competitive products, one located in the South and the other in Rhode Island:

	Southern mill 40-hour wage	Rhode Island 40-hour wage	Differ- ential	Percent
Card tender.....	$12.40	$14.64	$2.24	18.06
Card grinder.....	14.40	20.52	6.12	42.50
Spinner.....	12.40	14.88	2.48	20.00
Spinning doffer.....	12.40	17.20	4.80	38.71
Spinning section hand.....	14.40	16.85	2.45	17.01
Warper tender.....	12.80	16.04	3.24	25.31
Weaver (standard).....	15.20	19.25	4.05	26.64
Loom fixer.....	18.00	25.00	7.00	38.89
Napper hand.....	13.20	18.30	5.10	38.64
Machinist.....	16.40	22.64	6.24	38.05
Battery hand.....	12.00	13.00	1.00	8.33
Average.....				28.37

Prior to the code, the difference in wages in North and South was variously estimated from $4 to $6 a week, with the southern mills paying the lower wage for the longer working week. Under the code, a differential of $1 in the minimum was established, on the theory that the southern mills were under greater expense in the maintenance of villages. According to the recent study of wages in the textile industry by the Department of Labor, the actual weighted average difference in wage for a certain group of classified jobs is $2.56. However, these classified jobs do not include more than 75 percent of the employees; and as the unclassified employees in the South all tend to be paid the minimum wage, whereas in the North they are paid more, it is probable that the actual difference in wages would average nearer $3. With approximately 70 percent of the industry in the South, it is obviously impossible, by code action, to bring the southern wages up to within the $1 code differential.

Another point under which the North was penalized by the code was in the maintenance of craft differentials. Under the terms of the code, manufacturers were required to pay as much for the shorter week as they had paid for the longer week, and maintain the amount of differences existing prior to July 17, 1933, between the wage rates paid various classes of employees, classified according to operations. Inasmuch as this difference was greater in the North than in the South, it has resulted in a relatively higher scale of wages.

It is extremely difficult to get comparative tax figures, but I believe that the total tax paid by northern mills exceeds the similar tax paid by the southern mills. Northern mills are penalized in competition with southern mills through a great many social requirements that all add to the cost of manufacturing. Among these would be higher workingmen's compensation, higher standards of sanitation, and so forth. While none of these, perhaps, is any large percentage of the total cost, they all combine to be another element against the northern mills in competition with the South.

A very interesting suggestion was made last week by a textile expert from my State, Mr. Burton, at a hearing before the Commission appointed by the President to study the cotton-textile industry. His theory was that the Government reports showed that there are 5,000,000 spindles that are not in use.

Based on no. 24's yarn, which seems to be about the average number made throughout the country according to an exhaustive study made by an expert, the potential capacity of these spindles is about 118 pounds each per 50-week year of 80 hours per week. This gives potential capacity of 590,000,000 pounds.

The average weight of goods in the United States is about 4 yards per pound, which means that these idle spindles have a potential capacity, when woven into cloth, of 2,360,000,000 square yards.

From studies made, 1 man-hour will produce 12 yards of print cloth. This means that there is an unrealized use of 200,000,000 man-hours in the cotton textile industry, or 5,000,000 man-weeks, or steady employment throughout a 50-week year for 100,000 people operating the above-mentioned idle machinery. This represents the exportable surplus capacity of the cotton-textile industry on the basis of present domestic consumption.

His theory was that this surplus export capacity of the cotton-textile industry be used to manufacture goods to compete in world markets on the basis of Japanese costs, and in order to do this, a Government-supported subsidy of 2 cents per yard on 64/60 cloths basis would have to be granted. This would cost the Government approximately $47,000,000 a year in subsidies, provided the cloth was sold. This cloth, when exported, would not pay the processing taxes because all goods exported have a right to withdraw the processing tax. It would cost the Government nothing in processing taxes because unless an inducement such as this is given, the cotton would not be manufactured. Ordinarily, of course, a subsidy such as this I should not feel like supporting, but with conditions such as exist today, with the textile industry of the country in desperate straits, drastic methods must be used, and with the nations of the world entering into all kinds of special trade agreements, and with different currencies throughout the world, the usual economic principles are not applicable. Of course a proposition such as this would have to be carefully worked out in order that there could be a proper marketing of the goods, and the marketing abroad would have to be put on a practical plan, and the practicability of sales ascertained before the goods were allowed to be manufactured on this basis.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Peek, special adviser to the President on foreign trade, at a hearing before the Senate Agricultural Committee on February 1, said that he would favor the establishment of a permanent board of foreign trade composed of men experienced in the various fields of agriculture, industry, and so forth, with powers adequate to deal comprehensively with our foreign commercial and financial transactions, and this body he evidently had in mind could well undertake such a proposal as this, as later in the same hearing he said:

As international trade cannot move on a one-way street and as we must increase imports if we are to be paid for increased exports, we should pursue a policy of selective exports and imports, sending abroad, preferably in manufactured form, those products we can best produce, particularly those agricultural products which are the backbone of our foreign trade and of our domestic prosperity, taking in return those raw materials which we need and such other products the importation of which will do the least violence to our domestic economy.

If such an arrangement as this could be worked out, it would be the means of increasing our foreign trade and paying for it, and would, in this emergency, be of tremendous help not only to the textile industry but also to the cotton grower.

It would put, as was estimated, 100,000 people to work and would consume eventually, if the plan works successfully, about one and one-half million bales of cotton. This, naturally, would increase the buying power of the workers and would make a demand for cotton, which should show an increased rate to the farmer by using part of the surplus of cotton on hand.

Relief payments for those unemployed, if 100,000 men were put back to work under this plan, would save the Government more than $50,000,000 per year for relief.

In addition to this idea, I would make the following suggestions, the carrying out of which are necessary to help restore the industry.

First. The importation of textile goods that can be sold cheaper than they can be produced in this country must not be allowed to go on, because the imports have been increasing at a very great rate recently.

Second. If the processing tax, which seems to me to be a heavy burden for the industry to bear, is not to be abolished, it appears to me that it should be placed on the finished product. Large amounts of interest would be saved and it would tend to prevent the pyramiding of the tax. Of course, it is well known that large concerns today have to advance hundreds of thousands of dollars to meet the tax, and they are not reimbursed for a period of several months to a year. The interest rate alone on this is of moment, and the curtailment of working capital is very serious.

Third. Above and beyond these, however, in my opinion, is the question of the removing of the differential in the wage rates between the North and the South. The wages of the South should be brought up to those of the North—not those of the North reduced to those of the South.

The theory of the Government, in raising the price of cotton so that the southern farmer could have greater buying power, is equally sound if applied to increasing the wages of the textile worker of the South comparable to those of the northern worker, and in so doing, increase buying power.

Even with these conditions remedied, there is the question of overproduction. The President's Commission should work out a method by which production can be controlled. With the attention that has already been given to it by the code authorities, it ought to be possible to determine the best solution of how the shifts can be controlled so as to produce work throughout the entire year without frequent periodic lay-offs.

The textile industry must be saved for its employees, their dependents, and the communities in which they live. To accomplish this result, it is necessary, in my opinion, to take steps along the lines I have indicated.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I desire to follow what my colleague from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] has said about the terrible condition which exists, not only in our State, but in the cotton-producing States, with the statement that I recently read in a newspaper of another large mill in Woonsocket which, when it was busy, employed some thousand hands. It is going to close down at once.

I think we ought to consider very carefully what we can do to relieve the grave situation which is now confronting the cotton-manufacturing industry.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MAY 7, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Strong Son of God, immortal love, we bow our heads and lift our prayer to Thee. Thou art the joy of loving hearts, the font of life, and the light of men. We ask Thee to establish an open way for us in the light of Thy countenance. We pray that our lives may spread and branch more and more, reaching a height of sympathy, tenderness, and helpfulness to which they never rose before. As we are debtors to the unnamed and unknown masses, may we ever hold them in sincerest consideration. Blessed Lord, toward all, give us a sense of honor, of softening manners and refinement of taste. Father in Heaven, be near us when the light burns low, when the heart is faint, and when our faith runs thin. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 272. Joint resolution to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to defray certain expenses incident to the Convention of the Imperial Council of the Mystic Shrine, June 8 to June 17, 1935, both inclusive.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4442) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate to the foregoing bill numbered 3, 4, 33, and 34, and recedes from its amendments to said bill numbered 23, 24, and 25.

B'NAI B'RITH

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, last evening in the city of Washington, at the Willard Hotel, the Speaker of this House did honor to himself and reflected great credit on this House of Representatives in an able address which he delivered before a large body of men and women gathered here from all sections of the United States and from foreign countries. His address is worthy of the high office which he holds. It should be read by every Member of this House and by the people of the country generally. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the RECORD at this point. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REMARKS BY THE HONORABLE ALFRED M. COHEN, PRESIDENT B'NAI B'RITH, INTRODUCING THE HONORABLE JOSEPH W. BYRNS, SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Every B'nai B'rith convention may be regarded as a reconsecration of its members to the tasks which B'nai B'rith assumes. No selfish purpose has a place in our deliberations.

In the sublimest way, B'nai B'rith is a religious body. Maimonides, the great Jewish philosopher and teacher, said: "That to be in the purest sense religious, a man must serve his God by serving his fellow men."

B'nai B'rith inculcates reverence for God and the duty of serving His creatures.

Our organization is the oldest of all Jewish bodies in this country except a few synagogues. Its original purposes were to promote the cultural growth of the members; to aid them when in need; and above all, to make them realize that accident of birth in nowise affects the worthiness of a man. From the beginning it was planned to establish branches in various places in this country, but I am confident that the thought never entered the mind of any of the founders, that B'nai B'rith—Sons of the Covenant—would spread until it covered, as it now does, nearly every country in the world in which Jews live in considerable numbers.

Yes, B'nai B'rith is an international Jewish body. It is the only international organization of Jews in existence. It is international just like love, art, music, and all supremely high impulses, are universal.

What the human family needs is more such internationalism.

Since that fateful day in March 1933, on which Germany ceased to be a self-governed people, there never has been an assemblage of Jews anywhere, in which tears have not been shed for their brothers and sisters in faith, who in that land are drinking from a brimming cup of sorrow. We are no exceptions, nor can we fail to contrast their condition with our own in our beloved America.

No merit of ours, and no demerit of theirs, is responsible for our good fortune or their sad discomfort. In this hour of joy, which would be unalloyed but for our anxiety because of their anguish, we want, once again, to assure our German brothers and sisters that our hearts are with them.

And the contrast of our condition with theirs becomes more striking as I now look at the gentleman who sits at my side, the guest of honor in this brilliant feast, the distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, who, in a few minutes, will favor us with an address. Imagine one occupying a relative position in the present German Government, seated among Jews, as their guest and chosen speaker.

It was not always so in Germany, and God's justice and mercy will not permit a continuance of present conditions indefinitely. Less than 8 years ago I, as president of B'nai B'rith, was the guest of the then Chancellor of Germany in his home in Berlin. The Chancellor entrusted me with a message to the Jewish people in the United States, expressing his and Germany's gratitude for what they had done for German children orphaned by the war. Hitler has made outcasts of tens of thousands of German children, whose parents, though living, are victims of ostracism, in a country to which, in countless generations, they had contributed their lives, their loyalty, and their best talents.

We Jews are eternal optimists. Our many bitter experiences have made us feel that right will ultimately triumph over might. Vivid is our recollection of the words of the Passover service, "Not one only hath risen up against us, but in every generation there are some who rise up against us, to annihilate us; but the most Holy, blessed be He, hath delivered us out of their hands." That has been our comfort and our consolation down the ages.

Ladies and gentlemen, I have the high honor and great privilege of presenting to you the Honorable JOSEPH W. BYRNS, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

ADDRESS OF THE HONORABLE JOSEPH W. BYRNS

Mr. President, members of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, and guests, I consider it a very great privilege and honor to be your guest this evening. I am mindful that higher officials of the United States than a Speaker of the House of Representatives have sent you messages and been pleased and happy to do so. Seven Presidents of the United States have sent you messages of approval and encouragement, and that in itself is a deserved recognition of which few organizations can boast. Theodore Roosevelt, William Howard Taft, Woodrow Wilson, Warren G. Harding, Calvin Coolidge, Herbert Hoover, and our present great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, are all on record as recognizing the value of the work of B'nai B'rith in building up good citizenship. President Theodore Roosevelt urged its members "to continue your work in strengthening the tie between man and man and endeavoring to contribute to the uplift and betterment of humanity", and declared that "it has been a great educational and enlightening factor in our American life."

Woodrow Wilson said in part, "I follow from time to time with the greatest interest the fine work of the order—work which undoubtedly contributes to the uplift and betterment of the Nation. And I have been particularly interested in the work of education and philanthropy and the effort to destroy the provincialism of prejudice as between races."

I have been for a long time familiar with the work and purposes of your great order, and I hope that the people not only of America but of the entire world will come to respect you for the great work which you are doing and which deserves the fullest approval and endorsement of all our people.

As present Speaker of the House of Representatives I join in these sentiments sincerely and truly, for I am well aware that the provincialism of prejudice between races is a stumbling block in the path of civilization, as prejudice of any kind is a heavy handicap to democracy.

Nearly 100 years ago B'nai B'rith was founded, and the accomplishments of the order have been such as to well justify pride in your work.

The preamble of your constitution states that the purposes of your organization, among other things, are to unite Israelites in the work of promoting the highest interests and those of all humanity; to developing and elevating the mental and moral character of the people, and of supporting science and art. There is everything here that the Nation hopes for from its citizens, and such aims and purposes well fulfilled have a profound influence in strengthening the Nation. How well the Jews have contributed to that influence a little reflection and remembrance will show.

The solicitude of the Jewish people in caring for their aged, the sick, and the orphan is traditional. This solicitude has called into being institutions in every part of the world which provide against the infirmities to which mankind is heir, ranging from homes for children too young to have known the warmth of mother love to old people bereft of kin to care for them in their declining years. I have in mind many hospitals of this great order in various parts of our country which are devoted to taking care of people old and young without regard to race or religion. It is no wonder that this great order, founded as it was 92 years ago, when the Jewish population in the United States did not exceed 20,000, has grown in strength, influence, and power for good during all the years of its existence.

Of course I am aware that the masses of the Jewish people now living in the great centers of our country are descendants of those who came to our shores a number of decades ago as exiles from Eastern Europe, the victims of pogroms and persecutions which shocked the conscience of the entire civilized world. But I did not know that so short a time prior thereto their number in our country was so inconsiderable in view of the active part the Jew had taken in the New World, dating back to its very discovery. It is interesting to know that in the first voyage of Columbus, which resulted in the discovery of America, several of his hundred fellow voyagers were members of the Jewish faith, and that on the day previous to his sailing Jews were ordered expelled from Spain. And I can fancy the ships, one carrying the crew of Columbus, and which was sailing over uncharted seas leading to a new land, destined to be a harbinger of hope to all the heavy laden of mankind, passing the other ship containing those who had been thrust out of Spain, borne down to the water's edge by sad-eyed and heavy-hearted men, women, and children, cast out of the land of their birth to find shelter they knew not where. I am sure the civilized world is happy over the fact that today, 4½ centuries later, Spain is welcoming back the Jew and inviting him to become a part of its loyal citizenship.

The first Jews came to America from Brazil in 1654 and they came as many of the early settler groups did, to escape religious persecution. They were inhospitably received by Peter Stuyvesant, who was then Governor of the New Netherlands, but his opposition was overcome through the influence of the Dutch West India Co., many of whose stockholders were Jews, and they were permitted to remain in New Amsterdam on condition that the poor amongst them should not become a burden to the community, but be supported by their own nation. And although B'nai B'rith was not then in existence, its spirit must have been present, for there is no record that the poor of these Brazilian refugees ever became a burden on either the Dutch West India Co. or the New Amsterdam community. Indeed, the manner in which the Jew has taken care of his unfortunate brother stands out as one of his noblest achievements, and the broad philanthropy of the American Jew is recognized the world over.

The small group which settled on Manhattan Island almost 300 years ago has kept pace with the country's growth but hardly more than that for the Jews in America today do not form 5 percent of the total population. That does not seem much of a growth in numbers, but what you have accomplished is much more important. Centuries of persecution and hardship in Europe did not succeed in crushing either the Jewish spirit or Jewish idealism, and in these respects the Jewish people present a most remarkable racial survival and America has profited by it. In all the activities of commercial life, of banking, trade, and transportation of our Nation, the Jew has played and still plays an important part. In science, medicine, economics; in literature, painting, music, sculpture, your best men have been up at the top, among the best that the country has produced. Indeed it may be said that the cultural wealth of America would be much the poorer should the Jewish contributions have been denied it.

You should be proud of the fact that this great organization has had and will continue to have an important part in the development of our country through its good influences toward shaping the lives and character of our people, and attaining the ideals for which America stands.

America furnished to the Jews what it furnished to all people, a land as Washington described it, "of sanctuary", which became also a land of equal opportunity, liberality, and toleration. And 135 years later, at the end of the Revolutionary War, when the Constitution of the United States was drawn up in 1787, liberty of conscience was made the foundation stone of American democracy and the Jews for the first time in the world enjoyed religious freedom and political equality.

They have contributed their share in all the wars in which America has been engaged. But their contributions to the civil life of our Nation have been more conspicuous than their military service, for the Jew is peace-minded, faithful to the admonition of his prophets to love peace and pursue it. Many of them have held high public office and made fine records as members of the United States Supreme Court and of presidential cabinets; Governors of various States and other positions of high honor and responsibility. It is impossible to refer to all of these by name, but I cannot refrain from referring to some of those with whom I have served since I have been a Member of Congress and some of whom I see before me. I recall Hon. Julius Kahn, of San Francisco, who rendered high service in the House during the World War. His capable and estimable widow, Mrs. FLORENCE KAHN, is now filling his place in the House with equal distinction and ability. Sitting here at the table is my good friend Hon. A. J. SABATH, the beloved dean of the House, who has for so many years served his district in Chicago, and the Nation, with particular distinction and conspicuous ability.

And also my friend, Hon. SOL BLOOM, of New York, who has rendered splendid service, the most notable of which was that in connection with the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, the Father of our Country, and who I think it is only fair to say has done more than anyone of his generation to revive and restore the memory of Washington and his high ideals in the minds and hearts of the present generation. And another good friend is the Honorable HERMAN KOPPELMANN, of the State of Connecticut, who enjoys the confidence and esteem of all of his colleagues because of his faithful and able service. Then there is the learned and eloquent Dr. SIROVICH, of New York, and Honorables EMANUEL CELLER, SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, and THEODORE PEYSER, also of the State of New York; and Hon. ISAAC BACHARACH, of the State of New Jersey; Hon. HENRY ELLENBOGEN, of the State of Pennsylvania; and Hon. WILLIAM CITRON, of the State of Connecticut, all of whom enjoy the esteem and friendship of their colleagues and are serving with distinction. I am glad of this opportunity to pay brief tribute to the service of all these distinguished Representatives.

One who serves in public office today must be judged not so much by his ability but by his devotion and adherence to American principles and ideals and the Government which he serves. Grover Cleveland said that "public office is a public trust", and we all agree that the man who holds the office should honor it to the best of his ability. If he does so, he is fit to hold it. And no man, be he Jew or Christian, who is unfit should be allowed to hold public office.

America expects every stranger coming to our shores to pledge himself that, given opportunity of establishing a permanent home here, free of religious persecution, free of political, commercial, or cultural inequality, he will do everything in his power to carry on the glorious traditions of his new country, to give his best, so that America will profit by his coming. This Nation is a free, democratic Nation, and nothing proves that better than that in this country religion and race are not barriers to a man's success. Religious prejudice is the worst enemy of democracy because it is always founded on ignorance, which begets suspicion.

We are rapidly recovering from the depression, which in recent years almost overwhelmed us. For the past 2 years our Government has been bending its energies to restore prosperity to the country. There have been some who have criticized its policies, but not one of them has offered any plan of his own to take the place of those which he criticizes. Large sums of money have been appropriated and are being expended to take care of the unemployed and feed the hungry and starving, which is the duty of every civilized nation. Congress has passed the works-relief bill to provide jobs for the unemployed and take them off the relief rolls, with the expectation that they will be finally absorbed by private industry through increased industrial activity. The House has passed the social-security bill to pay pensions to the aged and insurance to the jobless, which will at least to some extent take care of unemployment in the future, which in the very nature of things will always be with us to a greater or less extent. It is succeeding in its efforts to return prosperity, as is clearly shown by increased income-tax collections when compared with previous years, gratifying reports of increased industrial activity, and the renewal of confidence of the people who a short while ago were depressed and dejected and almost hopeless.

It is true that there is some mental unrest at the present time but in my judgment we have already recovered and the unrest is largely a state of mind. We can correct this by cooperation; by remembering that before we are Jews and Christians we are Americans and that American democracy is and must be a success. There are perhaps some who are not cooperating but it can be truly said that there can be no true American who will not now give his full and hearty cooperation to the government of his country. Too many people look upon the Government as something separate and distinct from themselves. Nothing is further from the truth, for the Government is the people. It is you, me, and every one of us, and the more you keep this in mind the easier it will be to give the cooperation which is needed now. Principles of B'nai B'rith demand this of you. The Jew has not failed in the past and I am sure he will not fail in this crisis. He perhaps, best of all, because of the persecution he has suffered for centuries in other countries, can more fully appreciate liberty and freedom in America which recognizes all men as equal and does not permit the persecution of anyone. Of all citizens of America he should be most alive to the value of the Constitution and the flag of the United States and should feel more keenly that those who strike at America strike at the freedom of all Jewish citizens.

What I am trying to say is that what we most need today is understanding—a freedom from prejudice, and we need good will and charity—that in honestly fulfilling the ideals of B'nai B'rith you will be making yourself and others good American citizens. In replying to a eulogistic address from the Hebrew congregation from Newport, R. I., second oldest Jewish congregation in America, Washington said, "The citizens of the United States and America have a right to applaud themselves for having given to mankind examples of an enlarged and liberal policy—a policy worthy of imitation. . . . May the children of the stock of Abraham who dwell in this land continue to merit the enlarged good will of the other inhabitants, while everyone shall sit in safety under his own vine and fig tree and there shall be none to make him afraid." Washington understood better than anyone the difficulties and dangers which come from ignorance and prejudice. They have no place in a democracy where national peace and tranquility depend upon the patriotic cooperation of every citizen, regardless of race and religion. In fact, a religion that does not make a better citizen of a man is not worthy to be called a religion.

We have been living in troublous times during the last few years and it has been difficult for most people to think straight. Indeed, the peoples of all countries have been badly beset. Following an orgy of extravagance there came a world-wide upheaval which continued so long that it reduced large sections of the population of our country to a condition bordering on want of the necessities of life. It would be strange indeed if in these circumstances false messiahs did not find followers. Hungry men, women, and children furnish a fertile field for the planting of noxious weeds in the form of honeyed words. Our country has been the freest of all lands from these baneful influences, but even we in the United States have not been saved altogether from the inoculation of this virus from abroad, and I regret to say to an extent from within. There have come to us propagandist and propaganda subversive of the high ideals for which our forefathers paid the price, whatever the sacrifice involved. In those days when they cast off shackles which oppressed them they declared that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty", and we can properly paraphrase that statement today by saying that "eternal vigilance is the price of safety."

It, therefore, behooves all who would perpetuate our wonderful heritage to prevent the introduction of any doctrine, however alluring it may seem to be, that will lead our people away from the landmark established by the framers of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. They have been our bulwark and fortress in times of peril in the past and they will be our tower of strength in all times to come if only we remain steadfast in our devotion to them.

PREFERMENT OF CHARGES OF IMPEACHMENT

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege for the purpose of preferring charges of impeachment against the judge of the United States Circuit Court for the Seventh Circuit.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that to permit me to submit a conference report?

Mr. ARENDS. I withhold it.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. CANNON of Missouri submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 6718) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

ADMIRAL RICHARD E. BYRD

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will withhold a moment, I send to the Clerk's desk two joint resolutions and ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

One resolution provides for an expression of appreciation to Admiral Byrd and the brave men of his exploration party, and the other provides for a joint committee of the Senate and House to join with the President in welcoming Admiral Byrd and his associates when they arrive in Washington on Friday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of two resolutions. The Clerk will report the first resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 273

Joint resolution extending the gratitude of the Nation to Admiral Byrd and to the members of his expedition

Whereas Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd and the members of the second Byrd Antarctic expedition are returning home from a successful and heroic exploration of Antarctic lands, wherein they have extended our knowledge of this vast area by airplane flights, tractor, and dog-sled trips, making extended and valuable scientific observations; and

Whereas the members of the expedition have displayed a courage and devotion worthy of the highest traditions of American exploration, and an unswerving loyalty to the superb leadership of their commander; and

Whereas Rear Admiral Byrd has added another notable chapter to the annals of American expeditions by his genius in organizing, transporting, and providing for the subsistence of his men while they carried on a program of research in 22 branches of science under the most adverse conditions, and he personally displayed exceptional gallantry in his lone vigil away from the Little America base in order to make important meteorological observations: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the gratitude of the Nation be extended to Admiral Byrd and to the members of his expedition, and that a copy of this resolution be appropriately inscribed and presented to him and to each member of the second Byrd Antarctic expedition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the further resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 274

Joint resolution authorizing the appointment of a special joint committee to meet with other representatives of the Government in greeting Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd upon his return from his second Antarctic expedition

Resolved, etc., That a joint committee of Congress to be composed of 5 Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and 5 Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, accompanied by the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives, is authorized to join with other officials and representatives of the Government in greeting Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd upon his arrival at the navy yard on May 10, 1935.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SILVER

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes, and will ask the gentleman from Illinois to defer his statement for that time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. On condition, of course, it is not taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER. This time is not taken from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Then I will defer to the gentleman for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho to address the House for 3 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, there has been placed on the Speaker's table a petition to take from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures the bill (H. R. 4357) to establish a bimetallic system of currency, employing both gold and silver, and to provide for the use of silver as well as gold in the national monetary reserve, for the purpose of securing a sound controlled increase of the monetary units in circulation through the unlimited use of silver as money and as the base for the issuance of money.

I wish to call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that under the banking bill we are now considering, all things we call money issued in circulation must be lent into circulation rather than issued into circulation, and somebody must pay interest on that money which increases the interest load on business.

Business recovery must be speeded by the creation and issuance of an adequate supply of interest-free money. Since gold and gold certificates have been withdrawn from circulation as money and now only function as currency through an indirect banking plan as coverage for Federal Reserve notes, thereby imposing an increased and constant interest load on business, it is apparent that the Government must replace this money which has been withdrawn from normal trade channels by increasing the use of silver through purchases of silver with silver certificates as a means of providing a controlled increase in interest-free currency formerly supplied by the use of gold. This is the only plan that can be followed by the Government under existing laws to supply an automatically controlled and necessary expansion of the currency that will be issued into circulation minus interest, thereby reducing the interest burden now being imposed on business, and at the same time increase the purchasing power both in our domestic and foreign markets, and in a measure stabilize foreign exchange.

I request support of this measure so that we may enlarge and increase the use of money that is being issued into circulation in contradistinction to money that is being lent into circulation through the operation of the Federal Reserve plan. The only thing we have today that circulates as money on which no one is paying interest is the silver certificate and we should therefore increase the silver in the Treasury through the issuance of silver certificates.

HEARINGS OF COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY OF THE HOUSE (REPT. NO. 833)

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman to withhold his point to permit me to report a House concurrent resolution from the Committee on Printing, and ask for its immediate consideration?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from North Carolina to permit the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I withhold it, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 20

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed for its use 2,000 copies of the hearings held during the current session before said committee relative to the bill (H. R. 5357) to provide for the sound, effective, and uninterrupted operation of the banking system, and for other purposes.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 5, strike out "two" and insert "one."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The House concurrent resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I will have to object.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE SENATOR CUTTING

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the funeral of the late distinguished Senator from New Mexico, when I was selected as one of the Members of the House to attend the funeral it was thought that the funeral would be in New Mexico. It has since been determined that it will be in the State of New York.

I was a great admirer of the able and distinguished Senator from New Mexico and had great respect for his eminent ability and his invaluable service to the Nation. Since it has been determined that the funeral will be in the State of New York I think it more appropriate that one of our distinguished Members from the State of New York should attend the funeral in my place. I therefore ask unanimous consent that such a substitution be made, and that I be excused, and that the Speaker appoint in my place such a substitute from the State of New York.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Texas will be excused. The Chair will make the appointment later.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois withhold his point of no quorum for me to make an announcement?

Mr. ARENDS. I will.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I regret to announce that my distinguished colleague [Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN] of Missouri will be detained in the hospital for many weeks to come. I therefore ask unanimous consent that he be granted an indefinite leave of absence.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CORN-HOG PROCESSING TAXES

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois further withhold his point for me to make a request?

Mr. ARENDS. I will.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record and include therein a letter from the Agriculture Department and my answer thereto.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, there is much interest among farmers in my district—the Third District of Nebraska—regarding processing tax on hogs and corn. Many cases are cited to me by farmers who are anxious for full details as to who really pays the processing tax on hogs; how the money is distributed, and where, if there is a balance in favor of the Government in cases where the farmer pays more tax than he receives back in benefits.

Because I have been asked these questions I directed a letter to Mr. Chester C. Davis, Administrator of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, on March 18, citing some very interesting cases and asking for an explanation.

Because I had not received a reply to my questions on April 8 I directed another letter to Mr. Davis, and on May 4 I finally received a detailed reply to both letters signed by Mr. Alfred D. Stedman, Acting Administrator. This letter is of unusual interest, and because of its interest to the corn-hog producers I insert it here, with copies of my letters to Mr. Davis:

MARCH 18, 1935.

MR. CHESTER C. DAVIS,
Administrator Agricultural Adjustment Administration,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DAVIS: I have inquiries which are based upon the following sets of facts:

(1) A producer sold 59 head of hogs (17,870 pounds), upon which was collected processing tax, at $2.25 per hundred-weight, aggregating.....$402.07

On corn-hog cooperator contract he was paid $5 per head on base head of 43, or $215, less cases, $6.45, netting.....208.55
Also two-fifths of 26 acres of corn at 27 bushels per acre at 31 cents, less cost of operation.....81.44

Total receipts from Government.....289.99
Collection exceeded contribution by.....113.08

(2) In another instance, a producer sold hogs upon which there was collected a processing tax of.....368.33
On his corn-hog contract he received a total of.....345.80

Collection exceeded contribution by.....22.53

(3) My attention has also been called to the cases of 2 producers, noncooperators, who paid processing taxes of $700 and $6,000, respectively, without, of course, any return payment from the Government.

Now, the question is put to me: "What does the Government do with these excesses of collections over disbursements, and what is the justification of collecting more taxes from the producer than there is restoration made to him?" In other words, why should the producer lose in a transaction that ostensibly has been devised for his benefit? I am primarily interested to know what application is made of these excess collections.

Please advise me fully.

Very truly yours,

KARL STEFAN.

APRIL 8, 1935.

MR. CHESTER C. DAVIS,
Administrator Agricultural Adjustment Administration,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DAVIS: Under date of March 18, 1935, I addressed a letter to you in which I stated some detailed facts and inquired concerning the disposition of the excess of hog-processing tax collected over disbursements made to cooperators. Whether or not the gross collections exceed the gross disbursements, individual cases are frequent wherein the tax collected substantially exceeds the benefit received back. I have not had a reply to this inquiry. I need the information. I trust that you will be able to furnish it to me very shortly.

Very truly yours,

KARL STEFAN.

MAY 4, 1935.

HON. KARL STEFAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. STEFAN: This acknowledges your letter of April 8 in which you make inquiry concerning the collection and distribution of corn and hog processing taxes. You ask for a more detailed reply to your letter of March 18 in which you told of several individual farmers on whose hogs there is said to have been collected from the processors more money than is being paid to these farmers in the form of benefit payments. You report that your constituents have asked this question, "What does the Government do with these excesses of collections over disbursements and what is the justification of collecting more taxes from the producer than there is restoration made to him?"

In case 1 of your letter of March 18, a producer sold 59 head of hogs (17,870 pounds), upon which was collected from the processor at time of processing an aggregate tax of $402.07, the current rate of the tax being $2.25 per hundredweight. At the same time, this producer received under his 1934 corn-hog contract a net total of $81.44 in corn payments and a net of $208.55 in hog payments. The hog payment was at the rate of $5 per head on a permitted production base of 43 head, less local administrative costs of $6.45. The corn payment was at the rate of 30 cents per bushel on contracted corn land appraised at 27 bushels per acre. There were 26 contracted acres and the total net corn payment apparently amounted to a little more than $200, but case 1 producer, as a partner under a share-crop lease, received only two-fifths of the total net corn payment; that is, $81.44.

As your letter states, the gross taxes collected from the processor on the producer's 43 hogs exceeded the benefit payments to the producer by approximately $113.08, but this does not take into account the sum of a little more than $120, representing the three-fifths share of the total corn payment, which apparently went to the other share-lease partner. When this sum of $120 is brought into the computation, as it clearly should be, then it develops that the total payments in case 1 really exceed the reported tax collections on the processing of hogs sold by the producer.

Now, the question arises, How will this excess of payments over collections be met? It will be met from tax collections at the processing of other farmers' hogs and corn and on any additional corn and hogs produced by the farmer in case 1 which are processed during the taxing period.

According to the present schedule, the corn- and hog-processing taxes will be in effect through a 3-year period ending November 4, 1936. The taxes became effective November 5, 1933. Most of the collections during the first 2 years will be required to meet the cost of the pig-buying program and 1934 corn-hog adjustment program. Distribution of benefit payments under the 1935 corn-hog program now being put into effect can largely be met from collections during the final year of the present scheduled taxing period.

As regards the division of benefit payments between landlords and tenants, the administration, acting on the majority opinion among producers, has specified that in the case of cash leases all payments should go to the tenant and that, in the case of share leases, the payments should be divided in the same proportion as the partners' shares in the division of the crops or the proceeds therefrom. In order to assure share-tenants that they would obtain a fair proportion of the payments, the landlord was prohibited from making any change in the lease or the tenure of the farm purposely to prevent tenants from obtaining the share of the payments they would receive if such payments were divided in proportion to the division of the corn crop and hogs the preceding year or to the division of the proceeds from such corn and hogs.

There are a number of cases besides the tenant-landlord cases under the corn-hog program in which the processing-tax collections on hogs and corn sold by the farmer either exceed or fall short of the benefit payments received by him. A contract signer, for example, whose hog-production average for the base period is relatively small with respect to his average corn acreage—say only 1 hog to every 4 acres of corn as compared with the average for all 1934 corn-hog contract signers of 1 hog to each corn acre—will under most circumstances receive in corn and hog payments an amount of money more than equivalent to the amount collected from processors with respect to corn and hogs produced by him and processed during the taxing period.

On the other hand, a contract signer whose average hog production is relatively large with respect to his average corn acreage—say three hogs per acre of corn—will under most circumstances receive in corn and hog payments an amount of money less than equivalent to the amount collected from processors with respect to corn and hogs produced by him and processed during the taxing period.

As a matter of fact, the total hog payments to all signers of the 1934 corn-hog contract are certain not to equal the gross processing tax collections on all hogs processed during the taxing period. In the first place, taxes collected with respect to products exported or furnished to institutions exclusively for charitable distribution or use eventually are refunded by the Government to the processor. Second, a net total of about $30,000,000 in hog-processing-tax money has been used to finance the emergency purchase of hogs and hog products during the fall and winter of 1933-34. Third, a part of the hog-processing-tax money is being used to provide corn payments due under the 1934 program. But after deductions for the export refunds and the cost of the emergency hog program are made from the total gross processing-tax collections, it appears that the remaining amount of hog-tax proceeds plus the corn-processing-tax proceeds will not exceed the 1934 corn and hog payments due. The budget for the entire corn-hog program including the emergency buying activities has been revised from time to time so that collections will be kept as nearly in line as possible with actual disbursements.

Thus the farmer whose individual hog production and corn acreage is proportionate with the aggregate hog production-corn acreage ratio of all 1934 corn-hog contract signers, will receive in corn and hog payments an amount proportionate with the percentage of the taxes, collected from processors on corn and hogs produced by him, that is, withdrawn from the Federal Treasury to make corn and hog payments.

This is assuming that such an "average" farmer feeds his hogs out to the average market weight of about 225 pounds per head and that he produces up to his total permitted production under the contract. If he feeds his hogs beyond the 225-pound mark, then the processing-tax collections on the eventual processing of his hogs will be proportionately larger than his total benefit payments. The processing-tax rate per pound of live hog processed is the same in all cases, irrespective of the total weight of the hog. I might say parenthetically that the producer in case 1 appears to have sold his hogs at an average weight of more than 300 pounds, consequently the tax collections from the processor at the processing of case 1 producer's hogs were larger than average per head.

If a contract signer does not produce up to his total permitted hog production under the contract, then the total of tax collections at the eventual processing of his hogs will tend to be less than equivalent to his total corn and hog benefit payments. In this failure to produce the total permitted number of hogs, however, such a signer simply improves the market for others who do raise their quotas and he is not taking full advantage of the better hog prices resulting from the aggregate adjustment in hog numbers over the United States as a whole.

As a matter of fact, the contracting hog producer who raises up to his quota of permitted production tends in the long run to profit more than the contracting producer who does not raise his full quota, even though the sum of taxes collected on the eventual processing of the former's hogs may exceed the total of his own benefit payments. The contracting producer who raises his full quota of hogs is able to take full advantage of the extra lift in hog prices resulting from the less-than-quota production of other contract signers.

Similarly, the producer who specializes in hog production benefits indirectly from the control of corn acreage on other farms, even though a part of the hog processing tax money is used for this purpose. Control of corn acreage means control of hog production and the maintenance of strong hog prices. Corn is the principal feed grain, and any appreciable change in the supply of it usually results in a corresponding change in hog supplies. Moreover, corn-hog contract signers who set aside corn acreage in order to qualify for benefit payments also must agree to hold their market hog production a specified percentage below their 1932-33 average even though their market hog-production base may be relatively small. The favorable influence on hog prices of this double-barrelled control of hog production more than offsets for the producer specializing in hogs the portion of the hog processing tax collections used for corn payments.

Nevertheless, some producers who specialize in hog production wonder why a part of the hog-processing-tax collections should be used to help control corn production. There are two principal reasons.

First, as I have already indicated, it would be impossible to maintain a balanced hog production for any length of time without adequate control of corn production, even if all farmers specializing in the hog enterprise should agree to limit farrowings and were to share all of the processing-tax money as hog payments. In the absence of an adequately financed acreage-control program, corn production would be free to increase and undoubtedly would increase. Judging by past experience, we would then expect hog production to increase and hog prices to fall.

Temporarily, hog production might remain in balance with demand. Inevitably, however, producers specializing in the corn enterprise and not participating in the hog-control program would themselves turn to heavier hog production. They would be prompted to do this by a rise in the price of hogs relative to corn, induced, on the one hand, by the adjustment in hog numbers, and, on the other hand, by a fall in the price of corn due to unrestricted acreage and lessened feeding demand for corn on account of smaller hog numbers. Eventually the distribution of hog-processing taxes solely in the form of hog payments would be more than offset by a depression of the market price of hogs caused by increased hog production among outsiders.

In the second place, it is not practicable to collect sufficient funds from the corn-processing tax alone to handle all of the corn payments that are required by an adequate corn acreage control program. Only the relatively small volume of corn which enters commercial and industrial trade channels and actually is milled can be directly reached by a tax. The corn-processing tax collections will provide only about 10 to 15 percent of the total of corn payments due under the 1934 corn-hog contract. The remainder is being provided from hog-processing tax collections and from funds amounting to about $37,000,000 available under general appropriations for the administration of the Adjustment Act.

It would be necessary to adopt a complex system of collecting fees on all corn that is fed; that is, on all corn that is processed by livestock, in order to obtain sufficient funds for corn payments from a corn-processing tax alone. The nearest satisfactory approach is to tax the processing of livestock derived from corn and affected by the control program.

Financing a part of the cost of corn-acreage control out of hog-processing tax collections, however, is not a matter of controversy among the majority of contract signers, because most of them usually are engaged in the corn enterprise to an extent reasonably proportionate with the extent of their hog enterprise. A preliminary survey of the 1934 corn-hog program has indicated that out of the total of 1,155,000 contracts, probably not more than about 10 percent do not also involve hog production.

In your case 2 example, a producer sold hogs upon which there was collected in taxes from the processor at time of processing a sum of $368.33. Under his corn-hog contract, he received a total of $345.80, thus leaving a difference of $22.53. I think the explanation in foregoing paragraphs with respect to case 1 also will explain case 2. Neither the weights nor numbers of hogs sold are given so I have no way of knowing if the producer carried his hogs past the United States average of about 225 pounds in weight.

Under case 3, you tell of "two producers, noncooperators, who paid processing taxes of $700 and $6,000, respectively, without, of course, any return payment from the Government."

First, let me say that unless these farmers actually processed these hogs for sale directly to or exchange directly with consumers, they did not actually pay the processing taxes or at least they are not supposed to pay them. The tax is payable by the person doing the first domestic processing. In the case of hogs, this means (1) meat packers who slaughter hogs, (2) local butchers who slaughter hogs for sale or exchange, and (3) commercial handlers, such as retail stores, who obtain carcasses or other hog products from producers or feeders and then resell, exchange, rehandle, or otherwise prepare the carcasses or products for distribution or use. It does not mean farmers who produce or feed the hog excepting when, after they have butchered it, they sell the products directly to or exchange them directly with consumers.

It is sometimes argued that the producer "pays" the tax because he no longer gets in the form of an open-market price all of the total amount paid by the processor for each hog slaughtered. This statement, however, has no real significance so long as the combined income from both the open-market price and the benefit payment is larger than before. To say that the producer pays the processing tax when farm income has been increased by a program financed by tax collections is to confuse the meaning of the word "pay."

It is now clearly apparent that the adjustment program is increasing total corn and hog income to the producing group. Hog numbers in the United States in 1934 were reduced by about 20,000-000 head, but hog prices more than doubled during the year, and total hog income, including corn-hog benefit payment amounted to about $653,000,000 as compared with $509,418,000 the year before. After allowance for the gradual increase that has taken place in the prices of things farmers buy, 1934 hog income was about 15 percent greater than in 1933 and more than 50 percent greater than in 1932. Likewise, hog prices at the farm in 1934 averaged about $4.25 per hundredweight, or about 20 percent higher than for the preceding year, and the average price received by farmers for hogs during the first quarter of 1935 was about $7.35 per hundredweight, or more than double the price received during the first quarter of 1934 before the adjustment in hogs became fully effective.

Even the nonsigners, to whom you refer under case 3, are benefited by the rise in the open-market price of hogs which results from the adjustment of production. They do not share, of course, in the benefit payments made out of the proceeds of the taxes, because they have not agreed to adjust corn and hog production in accordance with the corn-hog contract. Benefit payments are made only to producers who agree to adjust production and thereby contribute to the Nation-wide program to improve hog prices. Without the benefit payments or some similar device for protecting the cooperating producer against the actions of the noncooperator, a voluntary production-control program would be much less widely supported, and the efforts to increase hog prices would fail.

I hope that I have answered your questions in the desired detail. If you have further questions, I shall be glad to furnish any additional available information.

Sincerely yours,

ALFRED D. STEDMAN,
Acting Administrator.

Mr. Speaker, this detailed explanation by the acting administrator is rather confusing to me as it is to many of those who are interested in the welfare of the farmer who raises corn and hogs. The letter indicates the belief of the writer that the hog raiser is much better off today than he was before the restriction of hog raising was inaugurated. It is true the price of hogs has risen, but in my district the foundation stock of hogs has been pretty much depleted. Many farmers who had hogs to sell when this program went into effect have no hogs to sell now and cannot benefit by the increase in hog prices. Even now, when corn is selling at a dollar a bushel in my district of Nebraska, the price of live hogs is far less than cost of production. Hogs fed with dollar corn should be bringing at least 10 to 12 cents a pound for the hog farmer. At the present prices of around 8 cents the farmer raising hogs is losing money.

The letter indicates that the corn-hog program will be carried out into November of 1936, and it also indicates that there may be some danger that the hog farmer may continue under a processing-tax system which may penalize the hog raiser to pay for the expenses of a program carried out in 1933 and 1934. To me the study of this situation indicates that the hog farmer has carried the burden of the processing taxes from the very beginning and must carry the load of even the tax on corn.

There is nothing Congress can do to make any changes in the amount charged in processing taxes against live hogs. That power has been given entirely into the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture by the last Congress. However, I do feel that the hog farmer is being victimized because processing taxes on hogs have discriminated against the hog producer. It is true that prices of hogs, cattle, and other meat animals have increased. But the farmer who was forced to sell all of his livestock because of his financial inability to pay for high-priced feed is no better off today than he was before the program was put into effect.

While the corn-hog farmer can do nothing else but sign contracts because otherwise he would lose in benefit payments, yet there should be some solution toward giving the hog raiser more consideration when processing-tax questions are considered.

The general belief among farmers in my district is that the amount in hog-processing tax now charged is too high. Beef and mutton farmers have undoubtedly benefited from the higher prices of meat animals. Yet these animals are not subject to a processing tax. There is a general resistance on the part of the beef and mutton raisers toward any processing tax on their animals, indicating a fear that such processing tax might mean that those farmers who produce these animals may suffer as a consequence. It would be proper to assume that the hog raiser has a just complaint when he feels that he might be the victim of penalization if the animals he produces are the only meat animals to be taxed.

The facts are that the corn-hog programs have been signed and that the Secretary of Agriculture will continue this program as this power has been given to him by the last Congress. Taking this fact into consideration and feeling that the hog farmer wants the processing tax on hogs lowered, the plea is made that the $2.25 per hundredweight processing tax on hogs is too high; that it should be lowered and cut to around $1 per hundredweight and that the processing tax should be spread to other meat animals; that the producers thereof should shoulder their burden along with the producer of hogs.

The producers of corn and hogs in my district are patriotic citizens who have joined with the administration in endeavoring to help in this distressing situation.

These producers are not favorable to any destruction program. Those who signed the corn-hog programs have done so, in most cases, with the belief that not to do so would result in losing a means of livelihood. They have signed with the hope that their action would help carry out the program of the administration and with the hope that this program will eventually bring about something near a cost of production for the things farmers raise. They are, however, opposed to anything which may continue a program of continued restriction. Many have written to me indicating that they favor some adjustment program but oppose destruction or continued restriction. They favor any plan the administration may have toward the recapturing of foreign trade for American-produced farm products, and they will resist any program which may tend to restrict American farm production in favor of importation of foreign farm products in competition with the things American farmers can produce.

Members of the House should know that in the Third District of Nebraska, which was once known as the "world's richest agricultural district", the moisture today is bringing more hope to the farmers than any program of restriction we can devise. The farmers there are looking forward toward a great planting season and a bounteous crop of small grain, corn, and livestock. The moisture at this time has put the ground in my district in wonderful shape. The rain has come with a promise of better producing months ahead. It has come following years of drought and grasshopper plagues. It has brought renewed hope in the hearts of men and women who feel that the consequences of the terrible war and the drought were the enemies of mankind in our country. The American farmers are $799,000,000 more in debt this year than they were in 1933. But because of the money burdens of our people in my district, there is little hope for anything like the happiness which usually exists during a rainy spring in Nebraska. The majority of the landowners and renters in my district are financially embarrassed. They have borrowed far beyond their limits. Their ability to pay their debts has been impaired by long periods of hard times. Taxes and debt burdens with high rates of interest give them little hope for the future. More than 90 percent of the people in my district feel that the time has come for a period of lower taxes on public and private indebtedness.

Many of our people have had time to realize that the public and private debt burden of our country is staggering, and that the interest-payment burden on these tremendous debts cannot be paid. They feel there is a ray of sunshine and hope in any new legislation which will lower the rate of interest, and many of them are looking to this Congress to enact some legislation which will bring about this relief. It is my belief that 90 percent of the people in my district are watching with great hope the battle being waged by Members of the House to bring the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill up for consideration. Some may feel that the rate of interest called for in that measure may be too low. One-and-a-half percent interest may seem too low to those used to loaning out money at high rates of interest, but the time has come in our country when something must be done to relieve the debt-burdened people of their interest loads and at the same time get some money back into the hands of creditors who cannot even collect the interest on their loans and have faint hope of ever securing the principle. The people in my district are looking to Members of this Congress to bring this bill up for consideration; my legislature has passed two or three resolutions endorsing this lower-interest-rate measure; 20 or more States have endorsed it. There may be some who do not favor such a measure in this House, but for the sake of humanity and the debt-burdened people of our land, let us bring the measure up for consideration and reach an agreement. I believe that in this measure we can find an opening wedge to drive much of our present depression out of existence and bring back real and permanent prosperity to our people.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I renew my point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The doors were closed, the Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE SAMUEL ALSCHULER

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I rise here today for the purpose of preferring charges of impeachment against Hon. Samuel Alschuler, United States circuit judge for the seventh circuit at Chicago, Ill.

Mr. Speaker, in filing these charges today against a justice of the United States Circuit Court I am not unmindful of the gravity of the matter and of the immense possibilities of harm and injustice that might result to the individuals named in such a charge. I have spent many weeks on this matter and have consulted with different Members of this House in the hope of being set right in case my own zeal might have blinded me to other considerations that might throw a different light on the facts and circumstances in this case. I have been reluctant to take this action, and yet it seemed to me that the injustice wrought is so great, the amount of money in the litigation out of which these charges spring is so large, and the circumstances so grave that there seemed to be no other course.

The courts of this Nation must, like Caesar's wife, be ever above all suspicion and above reproach. If and when the confidence of the people in the courts is ever shaken, if and when the people believe that justice and equity cannot be obtained in the courts of our land, then will the Republic be well on its way toward dissolution, and I, for one, am willing and glad to raise my voice against courts and judges anywhere in the land if I honestly and sincerely believe that such protest is in behalf of the general welfare and in the interest of preserving the integrity of the courts. Doubtless these charges will provoke enmity, animosity, ill will, and hatred of a personal nature, but no public servant must let such considerations stand in the way of doing that which he conceives to be his full duty.

I shall put into the RECORD at this point some quotations from the footnotes that appear in the volume in connection with the impeachment of President Johnson.

In footnotes in volume I, Impeachment of Andrew Johnson, page 147, the proposition laid down by William Lawrence and B. F. Butler:

The result is that an impeachable high crime or misdemeanor is one in its nature or consequence subversive of some fundamental or essential principle of government, or highly prejudicial to the public interest, and this may consist of a violation of the Constitution, of law, of an official oath, or of duty; by an act committed or omitted, or without violating any positive law; by the abuse of discretionary powers from improper motives or for an improper purpose.

Page 141:

Judge Pickering was tried and condemned on all four articles exhibited against him, although the first three contained no other charge than that of making decisions contrary to law in a cause involving a mere question of property; and then refusing to grant the injured party an appeal from his decision to which he was entitled (per Buchanan in Peck's Trial, 428).

Page 139, referring to Chase's trial:

Suppose he proceeded in the dispatch of business and from prejudice against one party or favor to his antagonist he ordered the trial of the cause, though legal ground for postponement was shown.

Page 139:

If a judge should order a cause to be tried with 11 jurors only, surely he might be impeached for it, and yet I believe there is no court in which he could be indicted (Wickliffe re Peck's Trial).

Samuel Alschuler, justice of the circuit court of appeals, seventh circuit, is impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors in said office upon the following specific charges:

First: Said Samuel Alschuler, having been nominated by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and while acting as justice of the circuit court of appeals, seventh circuit, at Chicago, Ill., did on divers and various occasions so abuse the powers of his high office and so conduct himself as to be guilty of favoritism, oppression, and judicial misconduct whereby he has brought the administration of justice in said seventh circuit in the said circuit court of appeals of which he is a justice, into disrepute by his aforesaid conduct and acts and is guilty of misbehavior and misconduct falling under the constitutional provision as ground for impeachment and removal from office.

Second: That said Samuel Alschuler did knowingly and willfully violate his oath of office as such justice and became and was in his said office knowingly and corruptly guilty of favoritism to certain corporations then appellants in a cause pending before the said circuit court of appeals, seventh circuit, to wit, to Pullman, Inc., the Pullman Co., Pullman Car & Manufacturing Corporation, and Safety Car Heating & Lighting Co., and to Edward F. Dunne, Jr., attorney for said appellant corporations (no. 5113 in said circuit court of appeals); that the suit herein was filed in the district court on January 8, 1929, and at that time Edward F. Dunne, Jr., and Edward F. Dunne, Sr., were each of them attorneys at law with offices in Chicago, Ill.; that Robert S. Blair, a patent lawyer, at the city of New York, was attorney for the Pullman corporations and Safety Co. and filed his appearance in the Chicago suit. One Delos G. Haynes, of St. Louis, junior counsel, also filed his appearance, and Edward F. Dunne, Jr., did not then appear. It is stated in the Blair brief in this cause that in March 1929 (60 days after suit was begun in Chicago) that Laurence A. Janney, of New York, and Edward F. Dunne, Jr., of the Chicago bar, "who had moved to New York, formed with Robert S. Blair and certain others the firm of Janney, Blair & Curtis. In January of 1933, upon certain changes in the personnel of that firm, the name was altered to Blair, Curtis & Dunne." It also appears from said brief, page 17: "Judge Alschuler is a friend of Governor Dunne (meaning Edward F. Dunne). These two gentlemen have known and esteemed each other for nearly 50 years." The said justice, Samuel Alschuler, has been known as the "very close friend" of said Edward F. Dunne for more than 50 years and said Alschuler and Dunne have been known as "maintaining a long-time and very close affiliation and relationship"; that during the hearing and decision of the said patent suit and before and after the hearing the said Samuel Alschuler was active in and president of the Edward F. Dunne Portrait Association, which association arranged with an artist, Mrs. Paul Godehna, of Chicago, to make an oil painting of Edward F. Dunne and the said association presented the portrait on October 13, 1934, and at the said ceremony the said Samuel Alschuler took a leading part and made an address. The attorney for the Pullman corporations and Safety Co., Robert S. Blair, brought the son of Edward F. Dunne, close friend of the senior justice of the court of appeals, Samuel Alschuler, into his New York law firm within 60 days after the suit was begun in January 1929 and then subsequently altered the firm name to Blair, Curtis & Dunne. Blair and Delos G. Haynes appeared in the cause before the master and district court and Edward F. Dunne, Jr., appeared in the patent suit for the first time in the court of appeals. Edward F. Dunne, Jr., never made a motion or said a word in court at any time in the patent case. He was a silent lawyer. At the time the name of Edward F. Dunne, Jr., was added to the list of counsel for the corporations, they also brought into the record as chief counsel the name of George L. Wilkinson, lawyer, of Chicago, who is the chairman of the ethics and grievance committee at the Patent Bar Association. The briefs show the chairman of the ethics committee in first place and the son of the "very close friend" of the senior justice, Samuel Alschuler, in last place on the list.

That said Edward F. Dunne, Jr., was so taken into the New York law firm of Robert S. Blair for the express purpose of providing a channel and means of communication between Blair and said Samuel Alschuler in the patent cause then pending, and that the said Samuel Alschuler was knowingly and corruptly influenced in his decision of the patent cause rendered on June 27, 1934, and rehearing petition decision October 4, 1934, in favor of said Pullman corporations and Safety Co. by the appearance of the said Edward F. Dunne, Jr., on the briefs in said patent cause; that said Samuel Alschuler knowingly and corruptly sat in said court as presiding justice upon the hearing and decision of said cause, and when and while he, the said Samuel Alschuler, was also president of the Edward F. Dunne Portrait Association, and when and while Edward F. Dunne, Jr., was attorney for the said Pullman corporations and Safety Co. in said suit.

That the circuit court of appeals, seventh circuit, wrongfully overruled the district court (Hon. Charles E. Woodward, judge presiding) which held in all matters in favor of Marshall Electric Co., complainant, and said district court entered its decree (July 26, 1933) finding the patent in suit valid and infringed by the Pullman corporations and Safety Co., and said decree of the district court was wrongfully and wholly reversed contrary to the evidence and the law by the said circuit court of appeals (Justice Samuel Alschuler, presiding) because said Edward F. Dunne, Jr., appeared on the briefs in the cause and the said reversal of said decree was a judicial favor to Edward F. Dunne, Jr., Edward F. Dunne, Sr., and the said Pullman and Safety corporations, and to Robert Barbour and William Warren Barbour, of the Safety Co., and to D. A. Crawford, president of the Pullman Co., and to the officers of said corporation, and the said judicial favoritism of said Samuel Alschuler while he, said Samuel Alschuler, was president of the Edward F. Dunne Portrait Association, constitutes judicial misconduct and misdemeanor in said office.

Third: That Samuel Alschuler, as such justice, on the 27th day of June 1934 and October 4, 1934, unlawfully, willfully, and corruptly reversed the District Court of the United States without any evidence in the record upon which to base such a reversal and in direct contradiction of the rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States and of its own prior holdings, and to accomplish that result in this patent case gave to prior art patents a construction and operation they do not have and do not claim and yet, one now judicially given to them (notably the Turbayne patent) by the circuit court of appeals. (See decision 72 Fed. (2d) 474.)

That 35 witnesses appeared for the Pullman and Safety Cos., including their expert, Harold Pender, and none of them denied the testimony for complainant. Pender corroborated the complainant in important respects, yet the opinion of the court reversed the chancellor and disregards the evidence for the Pullman and the Safety Co. as well as that for the complainant. The court of appeals entirely disregarded the delay and laches of the Safety Co. in asserting any claim on their patents from 1923 to 1929, although the same court shortly before in a similar case relied on laches. The court of appeals found all the elements of the patent claim present in the infringing devices and also the operation thereof. The opinion shows that the gist of the device was taken and the capital idea is being used by appellants, and yet the court found there was no infringement. The court of appeals gave to a basic patent owned by complainant a narrow construction and gave to the three paper patents of the counter claim, that were never made or used by appellants, a broad construction, all contrary to their own prior holdings, contrary to the decisions in other circuits and contrary to decisions by the Supreme Court.

In 1923 the Safety Co. recognized the claims and property rights of the complainant and denied such rights for the first time in 1929 when they filed the counter claims in the suit that was begun by the complainant. Yet the court of appeals wholly disregarded the acts and doings of the Safety Co. in that regard and disregarded the estoppel created by the conduct of the Safety Co. in 1923.

The testimony as to existing conditions in moving railroad cars was given for the complainant, but the appellants took the cars down to their yards and adjusted them while standing in the yards out of service, and testified about them when not operating, yet the court of appeals disregarded this testimony as to the conditions existing in moving trains and found for the appellants. The record is without evidence upon which to base their decision, and the opinion is contrary to the established doctrines of equitable estoppel, laches, good faith, and clean hands; and the court of appeals wrongfully reversed the district court and held for the Pullman Co. and Safety Co., and said Samuel Alschuler was the presiding justice in said court when said decision was rendered and, as such justice, knowingly and corruptly failed and refused to follow the law of the land.

Fourth: That said Samuel Alschuler did deliberately and willfully defeat the ends of justice and did prevent Marshall Electric Co., complainant, from obtaining justice in the United States courts while he, said Samuel Alschuler, was the presiding justice in the court of appeals and, at the same time, was active in and president of the Edward F. Dunne Portrait Association. That a patent suit was begun January 8, 1929, against the Pullman corporations and Safety Co., and in March 1929 Dunne, Jr., was taken into the New York law firm of Janney, Blair & Curtis, attorneys for the said Pullman corporations and Safety Co. In January 1933 the name of the New York law firm was changed to Blair, Curtis & Dunne. That during the entire time the suit was pending in the district court the said Samuel Alschuler stood in the said relationship of close friendship with Dunne, Jr., and Dunne, Sr. That uncommon and unusual proceedings were taken and urged by the defendants and their attorneys to trap the complainant and make a record in the case that would avoid the necessity for a decision on the merits by the circuit court of appeals. The following are noted:

First: A finding by a master or court that is based upon a personal inspection of premises or machinery by a master or trial court, in the presence of and upon consent of all parties, binds all the parties. Under such circumstances the finding of the master on a question of fact becomes final and will not be reversed. In the patent case the master began taking testimony June 15, 1931, and closed November 13, 1931. On November 4 Haynes, attorney for the Pullman corporations and Safety Co., made a motion that the master make such an inspection and the master promptly ordered such a session. The complainant insisted upon a complete record that could be brought into court and that did not rest in the view and memory of a master, and after repeated efforts to force the complainant into such consent, and after threats of ex parte personal inspection by the master and defendants, the proposed excursion was abandoned by them. The consent necessary to bind all parties to an incomplete record and that would make the findings of the master final was not given by the complainant and the trap failed. The motion came toward the end of the master's hearings and after the defendants had taken hundreds of pages of testimony in their New Haven laboratory and in the railroad yards, always avoiding moving trains, and was a subtle trap to make the finding of the master final. It failed. After the evidence closed the matter was held in the master's office for 14 months without any explanation as to the reason for the long delay.

Second: The district court was put under duress to find for defendants, the Pullman corporations and Safety Co. It is a well-known rule of law that any decision in which the master and district court agree is not disturbed by the court of appeals and is frequently disposed of by the court of appeals without any discussion on the merits. Robert Barbour, of Paterson, N. J., is a stockholder and the active director of the Safety Car Heating & Lighting Co., a New Jersey corporation. WILLIAM WARREN BARBOUR, United States Senator from New Jersey, is a stockholder and financially interested in the Safety Co. The two Barbour brothers were financially interested in the decision about to be then made in the district court—Hon. Charles E. Woodward, judge, presiding. Robert Barbour and William Warren Barbour are directors in the United Shoe Machinery Corporation, a New Jersey corporation largely interested in patents and license thereunder as applied to shoe-making machinery. WILLIAM WARREN BARBOUR is president and director of the Linen Thread Co. of Scotland and also of Barbour Bros. & Co. and is a director of the American Net & Twine Co. Robert Barbour is president, treasurer, and director of the Barbour Flax Spinning Co. of Paterson, N. J., director of the Linen Thread Co., Ltd., of Scotland; that said Robert Barbour and William Warren Barbour, so being financially interested in the said Safety Co. and in the results of the pending litigation before Judge Woodward in the district court in Chicago, arranged with their patent attorney, Robert S. Blair, to have said Robert S. Blair take the said Edward F. Dunne, Jr., into the Blair law firm in New York, and Blair did so. That said Safety Co. and Robert Barbour and others interested thereby secured the aid and assistance of the Dunne organization. That immediately prior to the argument on the patent case before Judge Woodward a Chicago newspaper printed an editorial under the caption "Courts Are for Justice", which lauded Judge Woodward and the justices of the court of appeals; that same was timed to influence Judge Woodward toward the Pullman Corporations and Safety Co., but failed in that purpose; that shortly after the argument of March 30, 1933, the same newspaper that had lauded Judge Woodward began to attack him in big headlines with suggestion of inquiry looking to impeachment.

A Representative in Congress was freely quoted with reference to such suggestion of impeachment and eventually Judge Woodward stated in the press he knew what was back of it all and that it would all come out in due time. During all of this newspaper publicity, the patent case was pending for decision. A Representative in Congress finally presented a resolution looking to an investigation of Judge Woodward and this was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House which appointed a subcommittee to take testimony.

On July 26, 1933, Judge Woodward decided the patent case in all matters against the Pullman corporations and Safety Co. That said investigation charges were preferred while the patent cause was pending before Judge Woodward and after the effort to cajole him by newspaper flattery failed; that said charges were brought to coerce said Judge Woodward to find in the patent suit for the Pullman corporations and Safety Co.; that the said Judge Woodward was put under duress; that said charges are now before the House. That said Samuel Alschuler was in a position to advise the said Dunne in the premises both as to matters before the master and before the district court, and that the said charges while the patent cause was pending operated to defeat justice and to effect a corrupt decision for the Pullman corporations and the Safety Co.; that the relationship of Samuel Alschuler, Crawford, Dunne, Sr., Dunne, Jr., Blair, Robert Barbour, and William Warren Barbour, and others, is such and their association with reference to the patent cause reveals the reason the decree of Judge Woodward was reversed by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals; that said Samuel Alschuler knew the relationship of Edward F. Dunne, Sr., and Edward F. Dunne, Jr., to him and that he was at the times mentioned president of the Edward F. Dunne Portrait Association, and that Edward F. Dunne, Jr., was in said cause as attorney for the Pullman corporations and Safety Co.; that a corrupt conspiracy accomplished its objective and in that regard the said Samuel Alschuler as such justice of the court of appeals did deliberately and willfully defeat justice and is guilty of judicial misconduct and high crimes and misdemeanors in said office.

Fifth: That Samuel Alschuler on the 27th day of June 1934 and October 4, 1934, willfully, knowingly, and deliberately did decide the cause then pending before the circuit court of appeals—no. 5113—without any supporting evidence on the major material proposition involved in the case and contrary to numerous decisions of the Supreme Court and other circuits and its own prior decisions, all of which were brought to the attention of said Samuel Alschuler at the time the matter was pending before the court of appeals.

Sixth: That Samuel Alschuler on the 27th day of June 1934 and October 4, 1934, in rendering said decision and denying rehearing, did unlawfully use his judicial position for the unlawful purpose of deciding with partiality and favor the pending cause, no. 5113, for the Pullman corporations and Safety Co. to the profit of their attorneys and said corporations and without regard to equity, law, and justice in that regard, and thereby brought the administration of justice in said court into disrepute.

Seventh: That said Samuel Alschuler was in a position to, and, it is believed, did, advise with the attorneys for the Pullman Co. and Safety Co. when the cause was pending before the master and before the district court and in the court of appeals. That the report filed by the master has the language of and appears to have been drawn by the attorneys for Pullman and Safety corporations, and the opinion of the court of appeals closely follows the form and language of the master's report. That inquiry should be made into the authorship of both the said master's report and of the opinion rendered by the court of appeals.

Eighth: That Samuel Alschuler knowingly used his judicial powers as an incident to and an overt act pursuant to a conspiracy to wrongfully and fraudulently take over for the Pullman corporations and the Safety Co. a patent known as the "Chandeysson patent" for the control of voltage in electric current, the same being a patent of very great value and now in wide-spread, world-wide use, and now in use in railroad cars and many other applications. The said patent is basic and of the same importance in the electrical power field as the use of carbon dust is in the telephone world.

The district court held the Pullman and Safety corporations to be infringers, and this ruling the said Samuel Alschuler reversed under the foregoing conditions, which acts and decisions under the existing close personal friendships and unlawful duress, coercion, and influences set forth constitute judicial misconduct, conspiracy, and high crimes and misdemeanors and subject said Samuel Alschuler to impeachment and removal from office.

Ninth: That Samuel Alschuler, on June 27, 1934, and on October 4, 1934, and at all other times mentioned, was and knew that he was president of the Edward F. Dunne Portrait Association and was a very close friend of Edward F. Dunne, Sr., for many years and that he, said Samuel Alschuler, was biased and partial to said Edward F. Dunne and to Edward F. Dunne, Jr., and toward the Pullman Co. and Safety Co., appellants, and biased against the Marshall Electric Co., appellee, in case no. 5113 then pending for decision by said Samuel Alschuler and said court of appeals and that it was then and there the duty of the said Samuel Alschuler as such justice of the circuit court of appeals to recuse the said cause; that said Samuel Alschuler being so biased and partial to appellants and their attorney Edward F. Dunne, Jr., and being then and there prejudiced and biased against the appellee, Marshall Electric Co., did knowingly and unlawfully fail and neglect to perform said duty to recuse the said cause but on the contrary, well knowing the premises, did unlawfully sit as presiding justice of said circuit court of appeals and did hear and decide said cause with unlawful partiality and favor to the appellants and to the said Edward F. Dunne, Jr., attorney for said Pullman Co. and Safety Co. and by his said failure to recuse and refuse said cause and by his conduct and decisions in said case said Samuel Alschuler knowingly and corruptly brought the administration of public justice into disrepute and the said failure and neglect to recuse and refuse said cause and his acts as presiding justice and decisions in said cause under the existing circumstances constitutes judicial misconduct and high crimes and misdemeanors in said office. That said Marshall Electric Co. did not know that said Samuel Alschuler was president of the said Edward F. Dunne Portrait Association until October 6, 1934, to wit, 2 days after the petition for rehearing was denied by said court of appeals. That said knowledge was not made generally known but was confined to approximately 100 members of the bar. That said Samuel Alschuler unlawfully took a biased and prejudiced and active interest in said cause on behalf of Edward F. Dunne, Jr., and the appellants and thereby made a fair and impartial trial as provided for under the Constitution and laws of the United States impossible and therefore the said Samuel Alschuler is impeached.

Tenth: That the Pullman corporations were at all times represented by said Robert S. Blair and Delos G. Haynes, and in the court of appeals also by said Edward F. Dunne, Jr., and the chief engineer for the Pullman corporations, Frank O. Marshall attended the sessions for the taking of testimony, and assisted the attorneys, agents, and officers of the Safety Co.; that the said Frank O. Marshall and the said attorneys acted in that regard under the directions of D. A. Crawford, president of the Pullman corporations, and the directors of said Pullman corporations, and that the said Dunne, Jr., at all times was in communication with said Pullman officials, and the said Pullman corporations officials and directors were active participants in the several overt acts above set forth, in the execution of said conspiracy, and the said Samuel Alschuler well knew that the said Dunne, Jr., and the said Safety Co. officers and directors, and the officers and directors of said Pullman corporations were each and every one of them engaged in an unlawful conspiracy in the premises, yet knowing said premises decided said pending cause for said corporations, contrary to his said duty above referred to, and thereby committed impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors.

Now, by way of explanation and elaboration, let me say that the Marshall Electric Co., of Elkhart, Ind., of which Thomas Marshall, of Chicago, is the president, held a patent on certain devices for regulating and controlling electric current, which was issued in December of 1925. The use of this patent has spread to such things as battery-charge control on locomotives, oil-electric and gas-electric units, multiple-unit cars, plating generators, generators on ships, voltage regulators in lamp and power-consuming devices on ships, radiobeacons, gyroscopic compasses, depth indicators, textile machines, and many other devices, which will indicate that its use involves millions of dollars.

The Marshall Electric Co. filed suit against the Pullman Co., the Pullman Car & Manufacturing Co., and the Safety Car Heating & Lighting Co. for infringement.

The matter was then referred to Mr. Thomas J. Peden, the only active master in chancery in the United States district court at that time. The master took testimony in Chicago, in New Haven, Conn., and again in Chicago, and finished taking testimony on November 13, 1931. He then held the matter under advisement for 17 months without any apparent reason, and when his findings were filed with the Federal district court he found for the Pullman Co. and the Safety Car Co., defendants in the case.

While this matter was pending before Master Thomas Peden, the master in this case asked the plaintiff Marshall to make an affidavit in behalf of William Scott Stewart, of Chicago, who had one time worked with Peden in the State attorney's office of Cook County. Peden described Stewart as his very best friend. The affidavit was intended to aid Stewart, who at that time was under charges in the Supreme Court of Illinois filed by the Chicago Bar Association. Marshall made the affidavit and delivered it to Stewart, and while in Stewart's office, Stewart made the following statement to Marshall:

You know I want to talk to you about this stuff pending before Peden. Peden has lost a lot of money in bank failures and foreclosures. You know that Peden, Judge Wilkerson, and myself are like this [holding fingers close together]. Now, what I want to know is, what you can do. I would not like to see you get the deal that was handed to the Checker (taxi) people. Peden, Wilkerson, and I took $106,000 away from that mob of taxi drivers and split it three ways and then decided against them anyhow. Now, in your case it ought to be a cut-in for about 10 percent of your net.

This statement came from a close friend of the United States master in chancery at the time the case was pending before that master, a friend who was under charges by the Chicago Bar Association, and a friend who speaks of his close connection with Federal Judge James Wilkerson at a time when this case was on Judge Wilkerson's call. This is the same Judge Wilkerson who was investigated by a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of this House under House Resolution No. 145, passed on June 12, 1933. The report of that subcommittee was, of course, limited to bankruptcy and receivership matters, and as to the proposed action of the subcommittee, I quote from the report:

Your subcommittee is of the opinion that the evidence does not warrant the interposition of the constitutional powers of impeachment of the House of Representatives, but in several instances conduct prejudicial to the dignity of the Federal judiciary is disclosed.

From the master the case went to the court of Hon. Charles E. Woodward, judge of the United States District Court, on exceptions and came on for argument on March 30, 1933. Judge Woodward rendered his decision on July 26, 1933, and found for the plaintiff, Marshall Electric Co., on every issue. Judge Woodward was another of the three Federal judges whose conduct in bankruptcy and receivership matters was investigated by the subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee, and the Members of this House may remember that I made some very caustic comment on the conduct of these Federal judges when the first report of the subcommittee became available and there was an opportunity to examine the findings of that subcommittee. I hold no brief for Judge Woodward and reaffirm what I have said about him and other judges on previous occasions.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am not familiar with the precedents, but I have the impression that in preferring charges of impeachment, argumentative statements should be avoided as much as possible. If I am wrong in that statement with reference to what the precedents and custom have established, I of course withdraw the observation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to violate the precedents, and if I have done so it is only because I have not had an opportunity to examine them thoroughly, but if the objection is well taken, I should prefer not to present argumentative matters to the House.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am sure the gentleman does not purpose to violate the precedents, and unfortunately I do not know about the matter myself. I am not advised as to what the precedents establish, but without looking them up, merely from the standpoint of what would seem to be proper procedure, it occurs to me that all argumentative statements be omitted in preferring impeachment charges.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, there are two more pages of explanatory matter which perhaps I should not present to the House at this time if the point is well taken. I would, however, like to put them into the RECORD as elaborating the statement of specific charges that have been made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is entirely up to the gentleman from Illinois so far as the propriety of his statement is concerned.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not want to violate any of the proprieties of the House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not know what they are myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is making his statement on his own responsibility as a Member of the House.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Permit me to finish this statement first.

Mr. CELLER. Then will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

However, while this patent case was pending before Judge Woodward, a Member of the House of Representatives was quoted in the Chicago papers to the effect that an inquiry into the conduct of Judge Woodward was being contemplated. It is a most singular thing that in March of 1933, just a few days before this case came on for argument before Judge Woodward, that he received the most lavish praise in a Chicago newspaper and that only 6 weeks later, that same newspaper published whole pages of pictures and reading matter with respect to the purported inquiry into his official conduct. Judge Woodward is quoted in a Chicago newspaper as having replied, "I know perfectly what is back of it all and at the proper time the facts will come out." I could mention many names and circumstances in this connection, but properly speaking, those are matters to be ascertained by the committee, if and when it makes an investigation into this matter. I need only say that volumes of conclusive proof are available at the proper time.

The case then went on appeal to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit sitting at Chicago, Ill., of which the Honorable Samuel Alschuler was the duly qualified presiding justice and the charges of impeachment fully recite the relationships that existed to indicate that there was a breach of duty on the part of Justice Alschuler and warrant a complete and impartial investigation of all the acts and circumstances in connection with this matter.

Federal judges hold office for life, conditioned on good behavior and can be reached only by constitutional action when there is good and substantial reason to believe that there has been a breach of duty and a violation of the integrity of the court. That constitutional action can only be effected by preferring charges, requesting a full and complete inquiry and investigation to ascertain the basis for such charges, and to return an impeachment if the committee to whom such investigation is intrusted finds that the charges are true as alleged. I express no further opinion in the matter except to say that I sincerely believe the matter requires immediate action on the part of the proper committee of this House.

Mr. Speaker, may I add this one feature. As I said at the outset, I have studied over this matter for weeks and months. It occurred with me that there was something wrong in the picture, and I wondered exactly how it might be attacked, and what relief the gentleman in question might get. I consulted with some of the Members of the House, and perhaps it is not amiss to say that I even consulted with the Parliamentarian in the hope that perhaps there was some alternative procedure that would make it unnecessary for me to stand in the well of this House to-day to impeach a Federal justice of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in my own State. I want the Members of the House to know that it is a procedure to which I have lent my efforts very reluctantly, but, seeing no other way out and feeling there was incumbent upon me a duty to perform, I have tried this day to perform that duty and lay the facts before the House and before the Committee on the Judiciary for their action and in connection therewith, I submit the following resolution:

House Resolution 214

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to inquire into and investigate the official conduct of Samuel Alschuler, a justice for the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, to determine whether, in the opinion of said committee, he has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor which in the contemplation of the Constitution requires the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House. Said committee shall report its findings to the House, together with such resolution of impeachment or other recommendation as it deems proper.

Sec. 2. For the purpose of this resolution, the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned; to hold such hearings, to employ such clerical, stenographic, and other assistance; to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures, not exceeding $5,000, as it deems necessary.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I have heard no articles of impeachment read. As I have listened to the matter presented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], it is nothing more nor less than a resolution asking for an inquiry, and not articles of impeachment. It seems to me that it is not a privileged matter, and the gentleman is not entitled to occupy the time of the House in this manner. The gentleman has not offered any articles of impeachment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has offered no articles of impeachment. He is simply making charges.

Mr. DOBBINS. I assumed he had finished. There have been no articles of impeachment presented.

The SPEAKER. Charges of impeachment; not articles of impeachment.

Mr. DOBBINS. I have heard no articles of impeachment read.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It seems to me this was in its entirety articles of impeachment.

Mr. DOBBINS. It is nothing more than a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Perhaps the gentleman did not hear the first part of my remarks. I will read the first paragraph of this report:

Samuel Alschuler, justice of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, is impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors in said office upon the following specific charges.

Mr. DOBBINS. As I understand articles of impeachment, Mr. Speaker, that does not amount to an impeachment at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not prepare articles of impeachment. That is done by the committee.

Mr. DOBBINS. It is simply a resolution of inquiry such as we have offered here every day, and is not a privileged matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only state what the gentleman said when he took the floor; that is, that he was preferring charges of impeachment against a certain United States circuit judge.

Mr. DOBBINS. But there have been no such charges; simply a resolution of inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is making his charges now.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am making the charges very specifically.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. IGOE. Does it constitute a charge against a judge of the circuit court of appeals to say of him that he was president of some portrait association which had for its object the purchasing of a picture of a former Governor of one of the States of this Nation?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the committee.

Mr. IGOE. That is all there is to this whole charge.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the committee to take under consideration.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield? I know the gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. Judge Alschuler was appointed by President Wilson in 1915.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am sorry, but I have not examined into that matter.

Mr. CELLER. Will not the gentleman state in all fairness that the circuit court of appeals is composed of three judges, and that there are four judges in that district, namely, Judge Alschuler, of Chicago; Judge Evan A. Evans, of Madison—

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield further.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman express the names of the other two judges who heard this case with Judge Alschuler? There must have been three judges hearing the case.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield and I refuse to have any controversy about this matter. I am asking that this matter be referred to the committee.

Mr. CELLER. I would ask the gentleman has there been an appeal in the case to the Supreme Court?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not submit to a controversy upon the merits of this matter, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to protect the gentleman in his rights on the floor. He has those rights because he has risen to a question of privilege.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. For an observation, if the gentleman from Illinois has finished.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I desire at the present time, or just as soon as I may be permitted to do so, to move that the resolution offered by the gentleman, together with the charges, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives. I want to offer that motion at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order now, of course, until the gentleman has concluded.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not yield.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution just read to the House, together with the charges of impeachment, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. SUMNERS) moves that the resolution, together with the charges of impeachment which have just been read to the House, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The resolution and the charges are referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, if I have ever been taken by surprise, I certainly have been a few moments ago when my colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] rose to offer a resolution to impeach one of the most honorable, efficient, and honest judges of any court in the Nation. I am still stunned by the accusations he enumerated, but failed to substantiate them. I am still undecided whether to consider this attack as a skirmish to divert the action of the Judiciary Committee in matters of some other judges, or whether my colleague has permitted himself to become an instrument for ulterior designs of someone else. I fear that the real purpose for this unwarranted attack has nothing to do with the honesty or efficiency of the judge in question. I can hardly believe that my colleague would go so far and besmirch a man for political reason or to do so for the purpose of minimizing the serious charges presented to the Judiciary Committee, which is investigating Judges Woodward, Wilkerson, and Lindley. Such an action on the part of my colleague would be undignified for a man of his position and standing.

Mr. Speaker, the accuser has not submitted any proof for his accusations nor have the accusations themselves any real weight. We cannot very well accept seriously the gentleman's statement that Judge Alschuler was a member of an association of some unselfish admirers of former Governor Dunne and a painting was presented at that time. This happened many years ago. The gentleman brings forth that the firm of the former Governor Dunne was interested in certain litigation which was at that time before Judge Woodward. The same case came before the circuit court of appeals of which Judge Alschuler is a member.

I know nothing of this litigation, and this is the first time I hear about it. My colleague says that this matter, which he considers a serious breach, was delayed for 15 months, and that it was before a United States master in chancery. Does not the gentleman know that the matter must have been referred to the master by the judge before whom the case was pending, namely, Judge Woodward? It certainly is clear enough that it was not delayed by Judge Alschuler, and, furthermore, Judge Alschuler could not have known that this case would ever be appealed, nor that it would be referred to him when it reached the circuit court of appeals. Does not the gentleman know that the assignments of cases in the circuit court of appeals are made in rotation? Consequently, Judge Alschuler, even if so willful as the gentleman is trying to portray him, could not have manipulated the matter in the way the gentleman wishes us to believe.

My colleague is mistaken when he states that the three Republican judges have been investigated as a consequence of my resolution. I have been repeatedly requested to offer resolutions of impeachment against Judge Woodward, Judge Wilkerson, and Judge Lindley; but I declined, in view of the fact that the matter is being investigated by the Judiciary Committee. The resolution for this investigation was introduced by my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], while no action was instituted by me. This attitude of mine was in compliance with the action taken by the committee, in spite of the fact that the Chicago Bar Association made a report against Judge Woodward. It was at the instigation of the Chicago Bar Association that the investigation was initiated. I regret to note that my colleague has seen fit to charge me indirectly to having given interviews about the investigation of Judge Woodward. On the contrary, I refused to offer a resolution of impeachment, in spite of the many real and serious charges supported by evidence and brought out before the House Judiciary Committee against Judge Woodward and the other two Republican Federal judges in the city of Chicago. These are the real facts of my activities in the case.

The gentleman charges that a few weeks before Judge Woodward decided the case in question a certain powerful newspaper or newspapers lauded him and that since he decided adversely they began to assail him. That as a consequence this powerful newspaper, and I believe he refers to the Chicago American or Chicago Examiner, I do not recall which, printed the charges made against Judge Woodward by the Chicago Bar Association. I am satisfied, however, that this serious charge against one or both newspapers is unfounded. Though not authorized to speak for these papers I am satisfied that they would never lend themselves for any such purpose. Though I do not share the policies of these papers, nor do they always agree with my views, I cannot permit such charges against them to go unchallenged. Not only that these accusations are unfair and unjust, but, I am satisfied, that they are untrue.

Serving with Judge Alschuler on the circuit court of appeals are three other outstanding judges—Judge Evans, Judge Parks, and Judge Fitzhenry. The latter was formerly a Member of this House and as honest a man as can be found anywhere, and a man enjoying a deserved splendid reputation. The same is true of Judge Evans. The fourth, Judge Parks, I do not know personally so well but he also enjoys a great reputation. These four judges enjoy the greatest confidence not only of the bar but of the people in Chicago generally. Never before has there been the slightest implication as to their character and honesty. They are known as gentlemen who cannot be swayed by passion or favoritism in the discharge of their important duties; they are scrupulously honest, upright, and able, and no one can safely dare even to imply that their official actions could be controlled or influenced to a remotest degree.

The circuit court of appeals in the last few months has handed down opinions criticizing the judges of the district court, of which Woodward is one; and I am inclined to fear that this resolution has been instigated and introduced in retaliation and for the purpose of warding off impeachment proceedings against the three Republican Federal judges of Chicago who are under investigation by the Judiciary Committee of this House.

Mr. Speaker, I did not act because I believed that the Judiciary Committee would properly handle the matter, and I believe it will in due time. I have the first report of the Committee; and if I had the time to read it to the House, I know there would be a general demand for immediate affirmative action.

I refrain, however, and shall not be carried off my feet by this nonsensical resolution introduced against a most honorable and outstanding judge just because he happens to be one of the very few Democratic Federal judges in Illinois. As soon as I can find the time to make a full investigation, and to digest thoroughly the evidence that has already been presented against these three Republican Federal judges, I shall act resolutely. I repeat, I did not wish to act before the Judiciary Committee has made its final report, but this resolution will compel me to act without further delay. There is sufficient supportable evidence, as shown in the first preliminary report, that these three district judges who have been investigated are guilty of real compromising offenses and abuses which bring disrepute upon our judiciary.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, let me say that there is nothing in these so-called "charges" and "insinuations." The son of the former Governor, a friend of Judge Alschuler, years ago moved to New Jersey and formed a law partnership. There could possibly be no connection between the matter to which my colleague refers in which the Pullman Co. was a party to some patent rights and, I repeat, of which I have never heard and know nothing about. However, I do favorably know former Governor Dunne, who for years was one of our outstanding judges, the mayor of Chicago, and the Governor of our State.

I cannot deny the assertion of my colleague that he has a positive statement from some lawyer who was approached by another lawyer named Stewart, that Stewart could be helpful to him because he—Stewart—is very friendly and close to Judge Wilkerson. Whether true or not, how could that in any way be held against Judge Alschuler, when everybody familiar with conditions in Chicago knows that there is nothing in common between Judge Wilkerson and Judge Alschuler.

I am satisfied that the people of Illinois will in one accord not only disapprove but condemn these defamatory, unfounded charges.

It appears to me that the dissatisfied lawyers who gave these nonsensical charges to my colleague made him believe it was an offense for the circuit court of appeals to reverse Judge Woodward's decision. However, in view of the evidence which has been piled up before the Judiciary Committee on Judge Woodward's actions, I am sure that that will not be the views and belief of the people of Illinois.

There is no favorable comparison between the official standing and confidence reposed in Judge Alschuler and his associates, Judge Evans, Judge Fitzhenry, and Judge Parks, on one hand, and the official conduct of Judge Woodward, on the other, who really merited the inquiry by the House Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, saying the least, I am not only surprised but I am amazed that my colleague, with the responsibility of his position, permitted himself to be used in filing these ridiculous alleged charges.

I am certain that Judge Alschuler will not ask for delay, nor will he send emissaries to obtain delay, but he will court fullest inquiry and insist upon an immediate and searching investigation.

I am confident that the Judiciary Committee will find after a most thorough investigation that these insinuations and reckless charges, if they can be thus dignified, are not only unwarranted and baseless but there will not be a scintilla of evidence produced to substantiate them or anything tending to show any wrongful act in connection with this or any other matter in the life of the splendid, courageous, honest, and fearless judge who is beloved by all who have the privilege of knowing him or who are familiar with his laudable, conservative judicial record. [Applause.]

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. DUFFEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I feel I must object, the specific business before the House today is consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not press his objection.

Mr. DUFFEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IGoe]?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask my friend from Peoria if he will kindly listen, because I want to ask him some questions.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to enter into a controversy with the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. IGOE. If he does not care to answer them he may remain mute in his seat, but I shall ask them just the same, and he may answer if he desires.

The first question I wish to propound to the gentleman from Peoria, Ill., is this: Is it a fact that the litigation discussed by you and incorporated in the resolution which you read here today is now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is not.

Mr. IGOE. It is not a fact?

Is it not a fact that the attorney whose name you mentioned specified these charges which are the basis of the charges you made here in a brief which was filed before the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Only in part.

Mr. IGOE. Wait a minute, wait a minute; let me finish my question. And the Supreme Court of the United States punished him for the language he used, fined him, and suspended him from practice? Just answer that yes or no.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. IGOE. Not to your knowledge?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. Do you not know, my friend, that a petition for certiorari was filed on behalf of this Marshall Electric Co.? Is not that true?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is true.

Mr. IGOE. And in submitting that motion was not the brief prepared by an attorney in Chicago named Thomas Marshall? Is not this true? Answer yes or no.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not sure whether it is true or not. Mr. Speaker, I refuse to enter into a controversy with the gentleman.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, so long as he does not care to answer, permit me to make a few remarks.

To begin with, I live in Chicago. I am not a candidate for Governor, which is something that may not be said about the gentleman who brought in this resolution.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman is not a gentleman or he would not bring that matter up.

Mr. IGOE. I refuse to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DIRKSEN. And, Mr. Speaker, I refuse to have such insinuations made about myself.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman's actions now, Mr. Speaker, are typical of the conduct which has characterized his everyday activities in this House.

I am not a candidate for Governor of Illinois. I do not think the gentleman who brought in this resolution can say the same thing about himself. If I were a candidate for Governor, however, I would not be quite so small as to come in here and attempt to attain my ambitious goal by destroying the good name of a fine man. [Applause.] Someone said years ago—

Who hath adjudged of aught
One side unheard, were himself unjust.

I wish the gentleman would take that quotation to heart, analyze it, and try to figure out what it means.

Mr. Speaker, who is this man against whom the gentleman has raised his voice? Samuel Alschuler, justice of the circuit court of appeals in the district in which the gentleman and myself both reside. I live in Chicago less than 100 feet of where this jurist lives. I know him personally. I know the manner of man he is. I know the kind of citizen he has been. I know the reputation he bears throughout the whole of the State of Illinois. The gentleman who brought these charges here today, if he had one ambition, it might be that when he has become as old as Samuel Alschuler now is, the gentleman from Illinois might bear some of the reputation that belongs to Samuel Alschuler today. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, let us see how silly these charges are. Let us see how silly the mere presentation of them is. The gentleman says there was something wrong and corrupt because Samuel Alschuler was president of the Edward F. Dunne Portrait Association. Is that not terrible? What does it mean? It means simply this: We have a practice in our State, when a man who occupies a place of honor, particularly upon the bench, retires from that place of honor, funds are gathered together and appropriate pictures are hung in appropriate places. Mr. Dunne has been a Governor of our State, judge of our circuit court, as well as mayor of our city.

Dunne and Alschuler have been friends, as the gentleman truly said, for more than 50 years. Dunne and Alschuler competed politically in times gone by. Back in 1912 Dunne opposed Alschuler as a candidate for Governor. Dunne was nominated and afterward elected. Then on through the years they remained friends. When President Wilson was the Chief Executive of this Nation one of the men who joined with other citizens of our community in asking that Alschuler be placed upon the bench was this same man, Edward F. Dunne.

Mr. Speaker, no one in all of Illinois has a finer reputation than that possessed by both Dunne and Alschuler. Mr. Dunne's son, Edward F. Dunne, Jr., went to New Jersey many, many years ago, and engaged there in the practice of patent law. It was not at all unusual, therefore, that he should be interested in a patent lawsuit pending in one of the circuit courts of appeals of this country.

The gentleman in this resolution sets out nothing improper on the part of either the father or son, so far as the Dunne family is concerned; but always and ever he is trying to bring into this picture that old Sam Alschuler must be corrupt because foresooth he happens to have been chairman of a group that collected money to hang an oil painting of Edward F. Dunne in the city of Chicago. By the same token I am guilty, too. I am a member of that association. You folks could join also if you want to pay $10, which is the only requirement. The only thing that Judge Alschuler did in this matter—and an examination of the facts will clearly indicate it—was to permit his name to be used as the honorary chairman of the committee that collected funds for this purpose. That is all he did.

For this gentleman to come in here and make the sly and unsupported charges against a man of Alschuler's character and reputation, Mr. Speaker, I say is something more reprehensible than I thought could be done in a body of this kind. I sincerely hope that Judge Alschuler will join with the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this House and insist that these charges be examined quickly in order that a decision may be arrived at as speedily as possible, to the end that justice may be done to Judge Alschuler, and to the end also that no one in the future will run as a candidate for Governor of any State in this Union by means of a crucifixion of a great man in the State in which he lives. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

Mr. O'BRIEN, Mr. DOBBINS, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. DUFFEY of Ohio objected.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a reply to the statement made by the gentleman who just spoke.

Mr. O'BRIEN, Mr. DOBBINS, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. DUFFEY of Ohio objected.

COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Immigration may be permitted to sit tomorrow during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is the day for the calling of the Private Calendar. The Clerk will call the first bill on the calendar.

JULIAN C. DORR

The Clerk called the first bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 4105, for the relief of Julian C. Dorr.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General is authorized and directed to credit the account of Julian C. Dorr, Department of State, formerly American consul at Genoa, Italy, in the sum of $606.77, such sum having been expended by the Department of State in shipping the household effects of said Julian C. Dorr from Genoa, Italy, to Barbados, British West Indies, in connection with a change of assignment, and such expenditure having been charged to the account of said Julian C. Dorr by the Comptroller General on the ground that such shipment should have been made on an American vessel under the provisions of section 601 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1928. The surety on the bond of the said Julian C. Dorr is hereby released from any liability arising out of such expenditure.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL MANUFACTURERS' SALES CO. OF AMERICA, INC., A. S. POSTNIKOFF, TRUSTEE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4178, for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes on this bill and some others that will follow.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, sometime ago we changed the rules and the procedure with respect to bills on the Private Calendar for the sole purpose, as I understood it, of preventing discussion of bills on the Private Calendar. I did not think it was a good idea at the time the matter was up, and I voted against it. However, a majority of the Members were of the opinion that during the first call of the Private Calendar we should have no discussion on the bills. I therefore feel constrained to object unless some good reason should be given why these bills are entitled to discussion while other important measures are not.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman that this bill involves an authorization of nearly $1,000,000, and I think this is sufficient reason why the Members should know something about it.

Mr. MOTT. May I ask the gentleman if he intends to object to the bill?

Mr. TRUAX. I shall decide that, I will say to the gentleman, after I make my observations.

Mr. MOTT. Oh, no; that is a fair question. Is the gentleman going to object to the bill when it is called?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall object unless the gentleman advises me whether he is going to object to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MOTT. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-two Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 68]

Allen	Duncan	Hull	Ramspeck
Amile	Dunn, Miss.	Johnson, W. Va.	Rayburn

Driver	Hook	Ramsay

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and eleven Members have answered to their names—a quorum is present.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.
The motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL MANUFACTURERS' SALES CO. OF AMERICA, INC.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4173) for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee?
Mr. McFARLANE, Mr. BLANTON, and Mr. TRUAX objected.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

ANTHONY NOWAKOWSKI

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 4210, for the relief of Anthony Nowakowski.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is not permissible.

The SPEAKER. The bill must be either objected to or considered.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Anthony Nowakowski the sum of $500, being the amount of a bond deposited as security and filed with the inspector in charge of immigration at Detroit and later forfeited because of his failure to depart from the United States.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "pay", insert "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Page 1, line 6, strike out the words "being the amount of" and insert "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States for."

Page 1, line 10, after the word "State", insert "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLAIMANTS WHO SUFFERED LOSS BY FIRE IN THE STATE OF MINNESOTA DURING OCTOBER 1918

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 3662, for the relief of certain claimants who suffered loss by fire in the State of Minnesota during October 1918.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. YOUNG, Mr. TRUAX, and Mr. BLANTON objected.

The bill was recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

THOMAS STOKES

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 604, for the relief of Thomas Stokes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Thomas Stokes, late of Company K, First Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 14th day of September 1887: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, strike out "3d" and insert "14th".

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ROY BECK

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 594, for the relief of Roy Beck.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPE and Mr. HANCOCK of New York objected.

The bill was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DR. GEORGE E. HOLTZAPPEL

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 5762, authorizing the President to present in the name of Congress a Medal of Honor to Dr. George E. Holtzapfel.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOTT and Mr. HANCOCK of New York objected.

The bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Library.

PERCY C. WRIGHT

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2566) for the relief of Percy C. Wright.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized and directed to appoint Percy C. Wright, who formerly was the officer in charge of an armament section of a tactical unit of the United States Army Air Corps and in training for a commission in the Regular Army, a first lieutenant of the United States Army Air Corps and to place him on the retired list for disability from injuries received while on a routine flight in connection with his duties as an officer of a Regular Army tactical organization, at Marshall Field, Fort Riley, Kans., January 29, 1929, dating his commission and benefits therefrom on the date said Percy C. Wright returned to civil life.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 3, strike out the period, insert a colon and the words: "Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, retirement pay, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

The committee amendments were agreed to and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CAPT. RUSSELL WILLSON, UNITED STATES NAVY

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 5564) for the relief of Capt. Russell Willson, United States Navy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. I object.

The SPEAKER. It requires two objections. There being no other objection, the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Capt. Russell Willson, United States Navy, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15,000 in full settlement for his invention which has been accepted by the Navy Department for use in connection with naval-communication facilities.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

JOHN E. CLICK

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2466) for the relief of John E. Click.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That John E. Click, chief clerk of the administrative office of the Alaska Division, Bureau of Indian Affairs, with headquarters now at Juneau, Alaska, is hereby relieved of reimbursing the United States for credit to the appropriation "Education of natives of Alaska, 1930-31", the sum of $261.82 paid to the Alaska Steamship Co., of Seattle, Wash., from said appropriation for transporting his personal and household goods from Seattle, Wash., to Juneau, Alaska, upon permanent change of station, under an authorization issued by the Department of the Interior.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

JAMES AKEROYD & CO.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 3337) for the relief of James Akeroyd & Co.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to James Akeroyd & Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., the sum of $3,645.75, with interest from November 1, 1928, to cover a refund on certain wood imported under the Emergency Tariff Act of 1921.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "with interest from November 1, 1928" and insert in lieu thereof "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

Page 1, line 9, strike out the word "wood" and insert in lieu thereof the word "wool."

Page 1, line 10, strike out the period and insert a colon and the following:

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claims of Sanford A. McAlister and Eliza L. McAlister, for the 6 months' death gratuity as provided under the act of December 17, 1919 (41 Stat. 367), as extended to Reserve officers flying the air mail, by the act of March 27, 1934 (48 Stat. 508), in connection with the death April 5, 1934, of John Leland McAlister, late second lieutenant, Air Corps Reserve, and to allow in full and final settlement of said claims an amount not in excess of $506.25 to each claimant, payable under the appropriation available for payment of the 6 months' death gratuity in the case of Air Corps Reserve officers under the act of March 27, 1934.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WEST INDIA OIL CO.

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1039) authorizing adjustment of the claim of the West India Oil Co.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and adjust the claim of the West India Oil Co. for the rescue at sea of Privates Solomon H. Churchill and John J. Callahan, members of Battery B, First Coast Artillery, Fort Randolph, Canal Zone, and to allow, in full and final settlement of said claim, an amount not in excess of $123.33. An appropriation of $123.33, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby made from any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for payment of the claim.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SCHUTTE & KOERTING CO.

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1056) authorizing adjustment of the claim of Schutte & Koerting Co.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of Schutte & Koerting Co., under contract NO-2018, dated December 27, 1926, for certain experimental work in the manufacture of valves for submarines, and to allow not to exceed $7,337.10 in full and final settlement of said claim. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $7,337.10, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of said claim: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CERTAIN DISBURSING OFFICERS OF THE ARMY

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1302) for the relief of certain disbursing officers of the Army, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of any disbursing officer of the Army for any payment heretofore made by him to the following-named officers and former officers of the United States Army based upon a credit for their services as cadets at the United States Military Academy and to remove any direct charge against any such persons on account of such payments: DeRosey C. Cabell, Thomas McF. Cockrill, James N. Caperton, Junius H. Houghton, Otto F. Lange, Paul B. Parker, James DeB. Walbach, and Victor W. B. Wales: Provided, That any amounts previously recouped to the United States on account of payments to the above officers based upon credit for service as a cadet at the United States Military Academy shall be refunded out of current appropriations.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

JACK PAGE

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 298) for the relief of Jack Page.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Only one objection. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Jack Page shall hereafter be held and considered to have enlisted in Company M, First Regiment Alabama Volunteer Infantry, on May 1, 1898, and to have served until honorably discharged as a member of that organization on November 1, 1898, and that the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to issue to said Jack Page an honorable discharge from said unit, which shall recite that such service was rendered from May 1 to November 1, 1898: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

COL. WILLIAM L. KELLER

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 3158) to give proper recognition to the distinguished services of Col. William L. Keller.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a similar Senate bill, S. 2024, be substituted. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in recognition of the outstanding service and contribution made to the science of medicine and surgery by Col. William L. Keller, Medical Corps, United States Army, and to provide that his mature professional judgment and long experience may continue to remain available to the public service, the President is hereby authorized to designate the said Col. William L. Keller, upon his retirement from the active list, as consultant in surgery at the United States Army Medical Center (Walter Reed Hospital), Washington, D. C.: Provided, That such designation shall be subject to the said Col. William L. Keller's acceptance and terminable at his pleasure; and it is further provided that he shall be entitled to the full active-duty pay and allowances of the grade held by him at the time of his retirement.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

ANDREW AMSBAUGHER

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2528) for the relief of Andrew Amsbaugh.

Mr. COSTELLO and Mr. TRUAX objected, and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RAYMOND A. WOLF

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2532) for the relief of Raymond A. Wolf.

Mr. TRUAX and Mr. DRISCOLL objected, and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JOSEPH GAYTON

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 5192) for the relief of the rightful heir of Joseph Gayton.

There was no objection, and by unanimous consent a similar Senate bill (S. 1414) was substituted, which the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Jean Marcella Mentz Gayton (now Wicks), the rightful heir of Joseph Gayton, deceased Sioux allottee no. 1724 of the Standing Rock Agency in North Dakota, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to existing law, the sum of not to exceed $4,400.25: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may deposit the said sum to the credit of the said heir and handle it in the same manner as other individual Indian moneys: Provided further, That not to exceed 5 percent of this amount shall be paid to any attorney or attorneys, for services rendered in this case: And provided further, That should the person herein named be not living upon the date of the passage of this act the said sum shall be credited to and become a part of her estate.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

CLETUS F. HOBAN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1703, for the relief of Cletus F. Hoban.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits under the United States Employees' Compensation Act the statute of limitation be, and is hereby, waived in order to consider the claim for compensation on account of disability alleged to have been the result of injury received by Cletus F. Hoban on January 11, 1932, when said claimant was in the performance of duty as conferee in the Internal Revenue Service.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That sections 15 to 20, inclusive, of the act entitled 'An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes', approved September 7, 1916, as amended, are hereby waived in favor of Cletus F. Hoban on account of disability alleged to have been incurred while a civil employee of the United States in the Internal Revenue Service at Los Angeles, Calif.: Provided, That no benefits shall accrue prior to the approval of this act."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HENRY DINUCCI

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1864, for the relief of Henry Dinucci.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Henry Dinucci, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500 as reimbursement of cash bail deposited with former United States Commissioner Arthur G. Fisk at San Francisco, Calif., and misappropriated by said official.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "as reimbursement of" and insert in lieu thereof "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States for."

Line 10, after the word "official", insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum in the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WILLIAM H. AMES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3596, for the relief of William H. Ames.

Mr. TRUAX and Mr. COSTELLO objected, and the bill, under the rule, was recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

ANNA W. AYER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3599, for the relief of Annie M. Ayer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. O'CONNOR). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a similar Senate bill (S. 896) will be substituted.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Anna W. Ayer, widow of Capt. Asa G. Ayer, deceased, the sum of $500. Such sum represents the amount of a cash bond forfeited on June 3, 1920, by Capt. Asa G. Ayer for failure to appear as a material witness in the case of United States against H. W. Coffin in the United States District Court for the District of Maine, sitting at Bangor, Maine, such failure to appear being caused by his necessary and unavoidable absence from the United States at such time: Provided, That the amount of the forfeited bond has actually been covered into the Treasury: Provided further, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

House bill (H. R. 3599) was laid on the table.

JASPER DALEO

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4815, for the relief of Jasper Daleo.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $98.80 to Jasper Daleo, as reimbursement for fishing equipment lost while giving his attention to the rescue of a Navy aviator who had been forced to alight with a parachute in the Pacific Ocean, near La Jolla, Calif.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 6, page 1, strike out "as reimbursement" and insert in lieu thereof "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

Line 11, after the word "California", insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DISBURSING OFFICERS OF THE ARMY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4838, for the relief of certain disbursing officers of the Army of the United States and for the settlement of individual claims approved by the War Department.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of Capt. K. W. Slauson, Quartermaster Corps, $225.07; Capt. H. M. Denning, Finance Department, $4; Maj. S. R. Beard, Finance Department, $5.63; and Maj. George Z. Eckels, Finance Department, $16.92, said amounts being public funds for which they are accountable and which comprise minor errors in computation of pay and allowances due military personnel who are no longer in the service of the United States, and which amounts have been disallowed by the Comptroller General of the United States.

Sec. 2. That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts to Maj. J. B. Harper, Finance Department, $24,882, said amount being public funds for which he is accountable and which represents payment made to the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co. for electric ranges purchased under specific instructions of the Secretary of War and which amount was disallowed by the Comptroller General of the United States.

Sec. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to R. N. Walker & Co., Nagasaki, Japan, $74.35, being the amount due this company for storage charges for the period June 7, 1930, to October 19, 1930, on household goods of an officer of the Army in transit to his new station in the United States.

Sec. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to W. E. Howard, Island Park, N. Y., $880, being the amount found due him as damages to his property at Island Park, N. Y., by reason of an Army airplane crash on September 8, 1933.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GERMANIA CATERING CO., INC.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 41, for the relief of the Germania Catering Co., Inc.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. TRUAX. Then I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KVALE. Could such a point of order at this time be regarded as dilatory?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not the first time.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman withhold his point of no quorum for a moment until I may prefer a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. TRUAX. I withhold the point of no quorum for the moment.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by incorporating an address delivered by our colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOTT. Reserving the right to object, is that in connection with the same matter in which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] asked to extend his remarks and was denied the privilege?

Mr. IGOE. No. This has to do with an address delivered by our colleague [Mr. CASEY] at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following memorial address of Hon. JOSEPH E. CASEY (Democrat), of Massachusetts, delivered at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier of the Civil War, Arlington Cemetery, Washington, D. C., Sunday, May 5, 1935:

We are met here today at this hallowed shrine, dedicated to the unknown dead of the Civil War, for the purpose of paying our respects to the veterans of that war who have passed on.

The presence of you men, veterans of the Grand Army of the Republic, who, at great personal sacrifice, have come here to assist in these ceremonies for your departed comrades is particularly touching. I think that one of the sweetest sentiments that comes to mankind is the thought that the spirits of those whom we knew and loved hover near us and look down with tender and approving eyes upon our good deeds. If this be so, then what a heartening message you venerable men send to them—the knowledge that, through all these years, they still live in your remembrances of their affections and their virtues.

The War between the States we now see as a terrible misfortune. I blame here and now no man and no policy for it; I will not say that it was the fault of one man, or one region of the country, or one party more than the other. How appalling it was. What a pity it was that men—brother Americans—rejected opportunities of reconciliation. What hot-tempered speeches were made—all to show how extreme and intrepid an advocate the speaker could be of the extreme northern sentiment or the extreme southern sentiment. And out of these utterances two separate opinions were molded, sectional hatreds were inspired, and a bloody war the result.

The statesmen of that day erred. War was the result. A war that inspired Sherman to exclaim, "War is hell", and Grant to utter, "There never was a good war or a bad peace."

We of this generation cannot censure the leaders of their generation. We had the advantage of their experience and yet since that war this country of ours has engaged in two major conflicts, the last of which was fought as a war to end wars.

Who can say that we are any nearer peace today than we were in 1861? Have we any definite assurance that the time will not arrive when men, by the use of the radio, the press, and by beating on a piece of pigskin, and blowing on a tin horn, will arouse us to a pitch of emotional instability plunging us into a war even more horrible than the last? Some of you may say that there must be some wars that are right and proper. I say that all wars seem right when they begin. It is only after they are over and calm reason returns that we appreciate their utter futility. It is my sincere hope that this great country of ours will not engage in another war unless it is forced upon us and leaves us with no choice except to defend ourselves with honor.

These men whose memories we honor here today were not statesmen. They had no part in the events leading up to war. No man can point an accusing finger of suspicion at their sincerity or impugn their motives. They fought for the right as they saw it. Like knight errants of old they went forth to battle and threw all that men hold dear—including life itself—like a flower at the feet of their country and their country's cause.

It is a matter of no small personal pride that three of these men whose memories we honor were my kinsmen. Men who bore the name of Casey—I see in this gathering Michael Casey, whose father, Michael Casey, whose grandfather, Mathew Casey, Sr., and whose uncle, Mathew Casey, Jr., were veterans of the Civil War.

If there are those among you who harbor the thought that these members of the clan of Casey entered this conflict because they just couldn't resist the opportunity for a fight, then I resent slightly, this soft impeachment. They were men who had experienced the heel of the oppressor in their native land. They had tasted of the liberties of this their adopted country. They knew that this was a land that offered more freedom to the individual than any other government on the face of God's green earth, and they went forth to preserve a Government they dearly loved.

These men of another generation met the issue bravely and courageously. May we find inspiration in their memory to meet the issues of today as unflinchingly. The flag of a free country does not take care of itself. Whether it shall command respect or not is to be determined by the quality of a nation's life. It rests with all the people. Those who fought to preserve our liberties and our Government are no longer with us. The great trust now descends to our hands. Let us cultivate a true spirit of union and harmony. Let us discharge the sacred obligations which devolve upon us in such a manner that when our time comes to pass this banner into another generation's keeping, it will then as now, be the badge of worth as well as power.

THE GUFFEY-SNYDER COAL BILL

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I could not preface my remarks upon this piece of legislation in more able language than that used by Senator GUFFEY in his statement at the beginning of the hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate, in which he said:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the legislation provided in this bill, in my opinion, will save the bituminous-coal industry of this Nation.

I believe I know something about this industry. I was raised in the heart of the bituminous coal regions of the State of Pennsylvania, and I personally know many of the operators who have engaged in the business. I also have personally seen the struggles of the miners to obtain some semblance of steady employment at wages which might permit them to live in accordance with those American standards of living to which all of our people aspire. The operators have been faced with overproduction and its resulting cutthroat competition, which, in turn, has brought ruin to them and their associate investors. The workmen and their families have suffered and starved. The desolation of their homes has all too often been most pitiable.

In my judgment, this legislation will eliminate these conditions in that it will enable the owners of and the investors in bituminous mines to obtain a fair return on their investments; it will benefit those who labor in and about the mines through the payment of fair wages and the granting of improved working conditions. In addition, it will protect the consumers against unreasonable prices and assure them of an ample supply of coal at all times. It will also result in the conservation of bituminous-coal resources for the use of future generations and the Nation itself in time of need.

This bill is of no mushroom growth, but is the natural result of the findings, reports, and recommendations of various commissions, and of prior legislation introduced upon the subject. The United States Coal Commission, appointed during the administration of President Harding, wound up its report with the following statement:

It is this indispensable service which the coal mines perform that give the large social service, both to the property and to its product; and in turn that social service, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use which creates a demand for public control.

In 1928 the bituminous coal situation became so desperate that an investigation was demanded by the United Mine Workers of America; which was held by the Interstate Commerce Committee of the United States Senate. The deplorable conditions of the industry were exposed and remedial legislation was introduced but came to naught. In 1932 the Davis-Kelly coal bill was introduced. While it was pending the N. R. A. was passed, which undoubtedly helped the industry. In 1934 President Roosevelt created the National Resources Board. Its findings and reports concerning bituminous coal served to confirm former investigations. Upon this report, former reports, findings, recommendations, and other similar legislation the Guffey-Snyder coal bill was based.

The bituminous-coal mining industry is perhaps the most overmanned of any of our industries. The labor connected with it comprises almost every known nationality. Coal is an exceedingly bulky commodity and does not lend itself readily to stocking or storing and, being generally consumed as mined, is therefore particularly subject to seasonal and economic fluctuations. Those of our commodities produced by mining are the most difficult to procure. Crops, lumber, textiles, and meat are produced with much more ease than is coal. Let it be remembered that the labor item in producing coal is 65 percent of the cost of the product, as against 23 percent in manufacturing. This high labor item, combined with the cutthroat competition, easily explains the labor strife which has always been associated with the industry. With an oversupply of labor and a continual buyers' market, high fixed charges, and enormous initial investment, what chance has the miner in an unregulated industry? No wonder they are the most exploited class of workers in the Nation.

Our bituminous-coal mines fall under two general classifications: Captive mines and independent mines. Captive mines are those owned and operated as integral parts of manufacturing operations or power companies. The owners of the captive mines objected to their mines being included under the provisions of this act. One of the purposes of this legislation is to better the condition of the coal miners. It requires just as much labor to produce a ton of coal in a captive mine as in any other. It costs just as much to maintain a family, whether the miner works in a captive or a commercial mine. Commercial mines are those which sell coal on the open market.

Some 40 years ago those interested in bituminous coal mining acquired extensive acreages of coal lands. The price per acre ran in some instances into several thousands of dollars. Interest and taxes have weighed heavily upon these investments. Coal in the ground can yield no return. The World War created an unusual demand for coal, which encouraged the opening of many new mines, with expensive equipment. A coal mine is an expensive plant to maintain in idleness. The sulphurous water causes the equipment to deteriorate rapidly; therefore the mine must be continually pumped. The heavy initial investment and the high overhead have encouraged the opening of new mines and the continued operation of those already open in hopes of at least earning taxes, interest, and overhead. The result has been a highly competitive industry with low wages, poor working and living conditions, financial uncertainty, with much industrial strife as the inevitable consequence.

To anyone acquainted with the conditions surrounding coal mining, it is surprising that there has not been even more turbulence. Certainly the conditions surrounding the life of the average miner are far from being inspiring. The average coal-mining town is unlovely, insanitary, and uncomfortable. Row upon row of drab houses, cheaply constructed and similar in design, perched upon bleak hillsides, exposed to the sulphurous smoke of burning slate dumps or open coke ovens, streets unimproved and sidewalks unknown.

Sporadic employment in the bowels of the earth, exposed to constant danger. Catastrophes which snuff out hundreds of lives. Frantic crowds of women and children gathered around the mouths of the mines, hoping against reason to see their husbands and fathers alive once more. The later constructed towns are of far better character than were the old, but too many of the old still exist. They are not centers calculated to promote the best attributes of citizenship. In justice to the operators it should be said that the economic condition of the industry could afford no better.

Our coal-mining population has made the best of its poor conditions. Their leaders, for the most part, are zealous in combating the spread of communism and similar doctrines. I have spoken on the same platform with P. T. Fagan, president of district no. 5, William Hines, president of district no. 4, and other officials of the United Mine Workers of America many times, and they advocated as fine a brand of Americanism as any speakers to whom I have ever listened. John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, in the hearings on the Guffey coal bill, before the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the United States Senate, made a statement which I believe to be typical of the attitude of the coal miners in this Nation. Speaking of representation for the miners on the proposed National Bituminous Coal Commission, he said: "We want a minority representation. We are willing to yield to the majority rule, the right of the public interest to govern." Those are the sentiments of a man whose philosophy is to live and let live.

It is worthy of note that those who appeared before the committee, either as proponents or opponents of this legislation, were in accord in their opinion that the N. R. A. had undoubtedly substantially aided in the recovery of the bituminous coal industry. Let it be remembered that most progressive legislation is violently opposed at first. Quite often, those who so bitterly oppose legislation at the outset, prove to be enthusiastic supporters, after experiencing its effects. I sincerely believe this will be the result of the Guffey-Snyder coal bill. This bill is justified and necessary, in order to promote the welfare of thousands of employees of coal companies, who must have a living wage in order to live decently, support their families, raise their children, and live as American citizens are entitled to live.

COL. WILLIAM L. KELLER

Mr. REECE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the bill H. R. 3158, which was passed a few minutes ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. REECE. Mr. Speaker, this bill not only gives recognition to the distinguished services of Col. William L. Keller, but it also continues to make available to the Nation the skill, the knowledge, and the rich experience of this invaluable officer.

One of the tragedies of our political system is the fact that we ruthlessly cast adrift many of our most useful public servants just at a period when experience and the years are making them invaluable.

Age is no barrier in a calling where only experience counts. So long as the mind remains crystal clear, the usefulness of the medical man becomes enhanced and multiplied with the years. The knowledge he has gained from thousands of cases in the past becomes an invaluable book into which only he can dip for the greatest benefit of humanity.

I am sure Colonel Keller will be appreciative of any recognition which Congress may give his services, but he has already won an honor beyond the power of Congress to bestow. He has won the gratitude and admiration of those whom he has served. To his skillful fingers and his brilliant mind, thousands of men owe their lives today, and this humble speaker is one of them. His life is one glorious record of unselfish service to the men who defend the flag.

Rated as one of the half-dozen truly outstanding surgeons of this country, he could have made a fortune in private practice. It is a matter of almost public information that he turned down flattering and lucrative offers from the outside that he might remain in the service of his country and to so play his part that today our medical standards in the United States Army are second to none in the world. The great medical center here at Walter Reed is in no small way proof of his great skill and executive ability.

To support this bill gives me a great deal of personal satisfaction.

CIVILIZATION AS IT FLOWS

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein testimony given before the Committee on Patents by Mr. Borglum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address made by Gutzon Borglum before the Committee on Patents of the House of Representatives:

Mr. Chairman, it is a great pleasure to me to accept this honorable committee's request that I make a few remarks on civilization as it flowers and as it is represented by its arts.

Our gods—money, power, government, war—all fall away, and with them their votaries disappear, ages before time destroys the record man makes of the experiences of his soul. The labor of civilization, expressed in her efforts to record her struggle out of nothing into consciousness and world dominion.

The fine arts are the language the genius of man has invented through his struggle out of the earth into his nest of leaves, out of his nest of leaves into a golden chair and into imperfect understanding of his own soul hunger into his final dream of heaven—this all wrought in mediums that express each mood best, as he suffers and grows, working out of the chrysalis of unconscious form into warm life, where consciousness awakes.

I understand you are attempting to create a cultural headship in our great political experiment "to direct"—I protest, never direct art; may I suggest, to foster, aid, initiate in art production—or is your purpose simply to establish a haven, a sheltering lean-to on the side of our great economic and political organism, where the hoped-for soul of America may find a protecting roof from sordid commercialism—another bureau that under the label of "fine arts" can become more lifeless even than our political institutions.

Speaking after the manner of statesmen and not as a politician, may I suggest that there is no office that our Government can conceive or create that will require so nice an adjustment of its functions as a department of arts. Just what it may do—how it may do it—what it proposes, and how far it can function outside of the routine of political administration and enter the true field of creative effort, without injury to the tender shoots of growing consciousness that appear wherever the human soul stirs, is a problem that requires gifts—ability, understanding—which few men have the genius or ripened maturity to possess.

No effort to aid such products greatly in civilization is known, comparable to the work of Cheops in Egypt, Pericles in Athens, Augustus and Agrippa in Rome, perhaps even better, Hadrian, later the Popes and the regal dukes of Italy in the Renaissance, in their understanding of the precise needs necessary to foster and aid, complete in all its nobility and splendor, the soul of their times.

No peoples outside of these have succeeded in lifting their civilization above the rank of common existence or adding a single step to the course of culture forward and upward to the height of their predecessors. Even France has not, with all her splendid craftsmanship; she neglected her greatest geniuses, who should have been definitely encouraged, made the mouthpiece of her aspirations, recording and dramatizing her splendid story, in letters, painting, in sculpture and architecture.

What England did, in letters and science, measures mightily with the Greeks; she left little in the plastic arts that was not borrowed from the Continent. The Germanic race gave all western civilization its music—and some heroic letters of her own life. Spain, unsurpassed in her masterpieces of Gothic architecture, reflected chiefly the overflow of the Renaissance of Italy.

Mr. Chairman, dynamically America is as yet a tradesman's land without adequate cultural consciousness. Officially she initiates nothing of distinct cultural character or quality. A nation should beware of placing any political adventurer in a position as high priest of an art she gave to the world so dominating, so compelling in arresting the subtlest forms of movement, voice, and color, recording the passing emotions of race suffering, joy, and growth as is possible on the screen. Otherwise such a nation does not understand the meaning or purpose of drama or art or the gross offense it is to the nation's culture to be interpreted by the inevitable standards he brings to it.

May I tell you and your august committee that no proposal before the Congress—that is before the Nation—can, properly conceived and administered, awaken its mind, affect its life as yours could. It means the establishment sooner or later of the only understanding in our people, therefore in our Government, that can deeply and permanently touch us and teach us finally that our hard times are misguidance, mental failure—failure, breakdown of mind and heart, reason, and courage.

Our ever-growing mass of unemployed is not due to lack of national and human service or long-neglected work that should be done, but to a complete misconception of the kind of service necessary; failure in America to know how to bridge the obstacles and to do greatly, disinterestedly, the waiting work of an organized democracy. Feeding the contented idle has proven about as effective and wise as flipping duck shot into a frog; it has awakened State cupidity, threatened the Union, and will wreck us if not stopped.

Opportunity is crying aloud to us everywhere. Food lies in our way; we've killed our markets; production is being stopped; we are backing down; we're quitting; money milderew in the bursting vaults of a selfish, palsied banking world; the men who create wealth manacled, hamstrung, in grave distress. We lack all cultural, far-sighted, or courageous conception of what civilization means or the will to listen or to act. Paris before Napoleon III reminds me very much of America today—a bewildered mass, a colossal gypsy camp. It took Baron Hausmann, a great organizer, to make out of that confused mass a modern Paris. It took a man, and an idea, and courage. We are fumbling with the philosophy of minds alien, and neither they nor ourselves conscious in the remotest sense of our trouble, or human position and human obligation, unacquainted with the unfinished tasks strewn everywhere over our wounded, ravished, disordered land. We are struggling stupidly, evasively, seeking relief in various forms to pensioned idleness, pampering inability, while we leave the power and health which action and work produce as a negligible consideration. We don't seem to understand what it is to do instead of dreaming things.

I wish it were my high privilege to help in formulating for your committee plans of how you could prepare America's great soul hunger for a great cultural awakening. When I speak of soul I don't mean some intangible dream thing that would quench its thirst on the morning dew, that sits and dreams its time away; I mean the real hunger in all for individual expression and action—healthful, productive action; individual chance for inside maturity; individual mastery of physical and mental gifts that beat in the heart and body eternally for freedom and expression, that have long been welling up within us—fallow, without fruitage, unexpressed, a menace to themselves, unused, a peril to our civilization and to our Government.

For this particular department of science, art, and literature I would like to see you take the three hundred millions of the "works fund", earmarked as the "white-collar allocation", and use it to help America become a democracy with a heart; the soul will take care of itself. I find at my elbow everywhere, here in this room, at afternoon teas, dinners, in the Senate, House, the whispered question, "Where and how to find those among us with creative impulse, how to put them to work, and at what?" There are so many of them and there is nothing to give them to do in our tradesmen's land. What can they do that is worth while?

Gentlemen, the permanently worth-while work that has lifted any civilization in the world's history out of the mud, in which most of it was conceived and born, was never initiated by big business, bankers, or politics. It is always a product of a few creative, constructive individuals.

America has a larger population of unregistered dreamers of great, of greater and more beautiful lives that might be lived usefully if given a chance, under sound leadership, than all Europe put together. Ours is a population made up of the soul hungry of civilization from everywhere.

"Jay Gouldism", "holding companies", worship of the golden calf, intervened, and we became a nation of throw-backs, shopkeepers, whose sole wants are purchasable by pound or yard! We can never rid ourselves of these parasites, but they must cease directly our course or we perish.

Build your department of science, art, literature; make it a conservatory in which to foster the genius of the land and demand administration of much of this big "white collar" fund. Be not afraid of wasting any of it; you—our Congress—have thrown to the dogs of trade five times as much in your pseudo-aircraft debacle without a whimper. Every cent spent on science and literature is our only permanent investment.

In trying to uncover and find an opening into the submerged heart of America, I would not attempt to foster art. I would spend millions in hundreds in getting into the "grass roots" in a still hunt for the cultural outcroppings that try and today die unaided everywhere in our beloved land. I would send out the call in no uncertain terms. I would go into the country where dreamers are born, who know, who live and travel alone. Genius protects itself with space—does not "thrive on the time-worn yoke of other men's opinions." "Heroes are not suckled on sweets"; they are companions of the moon—the stars—heaven their playground—they love storms—lightning—a destroyed giant in the forest is like a murdered friend to them. They are of the elements and as eternal; they immortalized Egypt, Greece, Rome, Italy; they discovered the western world; they invented the Republic; they began the city we are in; are we going to permit its further decay?

The art department's job is scout, not guide. Find the American spirit and help it to its feet; make it look up; tell America she is great, beautiful, wonderful; give her a chance to be all of these and you won't have to tell her to dance and sing and that there is no big black wolf. She will reorganize and stop the misuse of material power.

You will be amazed at the multitude of men, women, and children who have worlds of beauty up their sleeve, lives of loveliness they live all alone—finally, with unspent tears, abandoned for a job just to get their daily bread and secure shelter. Our civilization is a halting thing; we dare not admit its defects and we don't know how to improve it.

To me the department you have sketched means the correction of the above, if done in this spirit; don't tell anyone what wine to like, what songs to sing, what time of day or night heaven is loveliest. Help America to find her wine, her voice, her heaven—not yours or mine, but each his own—and suddenly this garden you have been preparing will blossom as the world has never blossomed.

In a practical sense I would do many things. I'd buy a million—or ten, if needed—photographs of the masterpieces of civilization of every sort, scatter them in our country schools, rotate them. Confucius said, "A picture is worth 10,000 words." The smallest school child gets mental and heart stimulus from pictures, to point to the things in creation worth while; follow that up with exhibitions, demonstrations, of how great and beautiful language in literature, in music, in the drama, in architecture, in painting, in sculpture can be and what it does to children's imagination—to men and women. Each of these—a dozen words, a dozen lines, a dozen notes, a splash of color, an eye, nose, and mouth trembling in a bit of marble—the cap on a column—each can be, yes, is a message from some fine creative soul somewhere left as his or her message. Those of you who don't see these things have missed most of life's accomplishments.

I would give to every country school, no matter how poor, opportunity of this sort, and in such degree as is possible, through photographs, literature, reports on these national activities—if your efforts extend the horizon of one child in a thousand, you could report 100 percent successful in forming a great cultural background against the sordid materialism that fairly oozes in and out of our bureaucratic life that dominates our trader world.

I believe it entirely possible for you to incorporate your department during this session of Congress—that is, at once; now. Why not? The time is propitious; it should be done; it must be done. Materialism is stranded; it is dragging its soulless body on every highway unable to get upon its feet.

I'd make surveys of every public building in America. First the Federal buildings, then the schools. Leave the municipal buildings for the city to care for and shame them into finishing them.

Then I'd develop plans for completing their decorations, utilizing local talent when and wherever possible. This work would soon determine its own best way of being done. With music and literature and drama we might include the problem of theater building, stadiums, or acquiring in part or entirely existing institutions and establishing open-air theaters.

The European nations purchase direct from the artist and sculptor their masterpieces and have them enlarged, cut in marble, or cast in bronze and placed about the nation. America should do this; the Nation should own all masterpieces. Ways and means would suggest themselves; no preconceived plan can be established.

I would inaugurate what Louis XIV inaugurated in France by example, "quality of workmanship"—all but dead in America through the demand for quantity production, needed in our hastily built civilization.

I would ask of no man, "What do you do?" but, "How well do you do what you do?" America, England, Italy, the Scandinavian Nations, are moving directly and definitely to quality production. Dean Inge published one of his ablest essays on this phase of craftsmanship and pointed out that patent truth, quality alone defeats everything in time. He applied it to industrial products.

Dr. Tugwell has just delivered a prepared speech at the Rochester Teachers' Association, Rochester, N. Y., April 9. He calls his speech the "Third Economy", and it should be read. Dr. Tugwell, whom I consider one of the clearest, most constructive thinkers in the administration, although I disagree with his and Mr. Wallace's theory and practice of farm relief, says: "So far we have not recognized that unemployment is the greatest of our potential resources, yet it is a fact that had we utilized the labor of the unemployed alone during the depression we could have given every family in the country a brand-new $5,000 house, or we could have scrapped and rebuilt the entire system of railroad, industrial, and utilities properties in the Nation on modern and efficient lines. This is an appalling waste and one which challenges statesmanship."

That statement is not new. I've shouted it for years, until I'm weary of repeating it. The ancients, all of them, when led by men of courage and common sense, gathered these idle together and made them work, build. They planned wisely, greatly, nobly; and the entire nation was carried by the character of these works, by the dissemination of new, greater civilization envisioned, to a new, higher level.

Dr. Tugwell's statement is extremely important because of his closeness to the national administration and, coming at this time, is not without tragedy. I am in the fullest agreement with him—"we could have given every family in the country a brand new $5,000 house, or we could have scrapped and rebuilt the entire system of railroads, industrial and utilities properties." Does America realize what that means? That statement, "We could have", is in the past; but surely it is not late. We can still do it, or something of equal importance.

I would like to wander for a moment into the tragedy of the great agrarian world, the great supply basket of all America—the great Mississippi Valley, 2,500,000 square miles of fertile, tillable land. Government break-down for 60 years has allowed big business, buccaneers, to establish "the gate" to and from these Elysian Fields, and the Nation has grown fabulously rich on their products. The farmers alone have become serfs; they alone are poor; they alone are in bondage. Everyone else is prosperous; everyone else is helped—and yet this vast territory provided the base of our wealth and still provides it. Politicians should beware these people; they supply the only unowned, incorruptible vote in America. Has the East forgotten that all the incorruptible, free thought in America comes from men who do not herd? I wish I could say something that would shock thinking America, as Tugwell's statement should—"We might have built a $5,000 house for every family."

I've ridden my pegasus into the heavens in this paper, but, make no mistake—I stable him and groom him here among our people. There are no dreams nor impulses in me that are not indigenous to this great west world where I was born and belong. I simply have tried too long, and at too great a cost, not to know that enemies, selfishness, are everywhere, hand in hand with good, and politics is the medium evil uses to corrupt statesmanship and good law. I know also it invades art in the highest places.

The fine arts, music, literature, and the drama, sculpture and architecture and painting, are the field where the noblest, most beautiful of human awakening finds expression, and from their high command affect all our leisure and working hours. Nothing should be spared by a great people to give aid and strength to their creative impulses.

Nothing is so protected in life, so sacred, as the birth of any creature or plant, the budding of new material life, the hope, the surprise, the phenomena of creation.

How much more wonderful, more sacred, the awakening of conscious new understanding—the appearance among us of thought—of a new thought, the appearance of what may change the course of entire material world—change civilization.

Do you know, gentlemen, to date, civilization has never recognized economically the appearance of the creative soul among us, nor recognized him or her until their broken bodies dropped in its path, clutching some key to some new heaven.

Let us inaugurate and dedicate ourselves and this nebulous department of art, literature, and science into one of helpfulness, sympathetic understanding, and let us determine that this land, where science, invention, discovery, have freed and given such fabulous wealth to this and all the world, there shall no longer be in this land an unfriendly door, no place where the unknown, the unproven, the incomprehensible may be driven away into the unsheltered highway because of failure to be understood.

Gentlemen, I have experienced these conditions over the hard course of a life unafraid of the world's indifference. I am interested in what you propose because I see in your plans a chance for economic freedom, for the students that will follow, protection for them in the tenderest shyest years of those people most valuable to our Nation, on whom will depend our civilization, our culture.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 530), an act granting compensation to the estate of Thomas Peraglia, deceased, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out "$7,500" and insert "$5,000".

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SAMUEL KAUFMAN

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3105, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to summon Samuel Kaufman, late major, Dental Corps, Medical Department, Regular Army, before a retiring board to inquire whether at the time of his resignation, December 15, 1922, he was incapacitated for active service, and whether such incapacity was a result of an incident of service, and if, as a result of such inquiry, it is found that he was so incapacitated, the President is authorized to nominate and appoint by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the said Samuel Kaufman a major of the Dental Corps, Medical Department, and place him immediately thereafter upon the retired list of the Army, with the same privileges and retired pay as are now or may hereafter be provided by law or regulation for officers of the Regular Army: Provided, That the said Samuel Kaufman shall not be entitled to any back pay or allowances by the passage of this act.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question: As I recall, when this bill passed the House it provided that this officer should be given the privilege of the Emergency Officers' Retirement Act. Is my recollection correct?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. That is correct.

Mr. HOPE. This amendment changes the situation so that he now goes before a Regular Army retirement board.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. That is right.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate amendment was concurred in, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONNECTICUT TERCENTENARY

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate Joint Resolution 94, establishing a commission for the participation of the United States in the observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Colony of Connecticut, authorizing an appropriation to be utilized in connection with such observance, and for other purposes, and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman if this is the resolution about which he spoke to me?

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. It is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby established a commission to be known as the "United States Connecticut Tercentenary Commission" (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission") and to be composed of 16 commissioners, as follows: Five persons to be appointed by the President of the United States, 5 Senators by the President of the Senate, and 6 Members of the House of Representatives by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The commission shall serve without compensation and shall elect a chairman from among their number.

Sec. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000, to be expended by the commission for actual and necessary traveling expenses and subsistence, while discharging its official duties outside the District of Columbia.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. KENNEDY of New York, for the balance of this week, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. DRIVER (at the request of Mr. MILLER), for 1 week, on account of pressing business.

To Mr. ROMJUE, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. ZIMMERMAN, indefinitely, on account of important business.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS,
Washington, D. C., May 7, 1935.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,

Speaker House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I herewith tender to you my resignation as a member of the Special Committee to Investigate the American Retail Federation.

I understand that it is necessary for the investigation to get under way. The author of the resolution creating same, Mr. COCHRAN, of Missouri, is now confined by illness in a hospital, and during his absence the duties of chairman would devolve upon me. I am informed that, in order to properly conduct the investigation, funds will be necessary. I doubt very much the propriety of the Chairman of the Committee on Accounts serving as chairman of a special investigating committee, and for that reason this resignation is submitted.

With high esteem, I am,

Sincerely,

LINDSAY C. WARREN.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KVALE. In view of the high character and standing of the gentleman who submits this resignation, is it not within the purview of the Chair to decline to receive the resignation and direct the gentleman to serve in this capacity?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has tried to impress the gentleman from North Carolina with that fact, but it is a matter for the House to determine.

Without objection the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

APPOINTMENT TO COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRITT] on the committee to attend the funeral of the late Senator CUTTING, and the Clerk will inform the Senate of this action.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

Bills and joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and under the rule referred as follows:

By Mr. BURCH: A bill (H. R. 7936) to adjust the salaries of rural letter carriers, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. CONNERY: A bill (H. R. 7937) to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. DEBOUEN: A bill (H. R. 7938) to authorize the transfer of the Otter Cliffs Radio Station on Mount Desert Island in the State of Maine as an addition to the Acadia National Park, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. FULMER: A bill (H. R. 7939) to authorize the erection of a Veterans' Administration hospital at or near Orangeburg, S. C., for Negro World War veterans to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

By Mr. SUMNERS of Texas: A bill (H. R. 7940) to prohibit the interstate transportation of prison-made products in certain cases; to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. DIRKSEN: Resolution (H. Res. 214) to investigate the official conduct of Samuel Alschuler; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FERGUSON: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 275) making appropriations for emergency relief in stricken agricultural areas; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mrs. GREENWAY: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 276) authorizing the State of Arizona to transfer to the town of Benson without cost title to sec. 16, T. 17 S., R. 20 E., Gila and Salt River meridian, for school and park purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. RAMSAY: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 277) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, limiting the decisions of the courts of the several States and of the United States relative to legislative acts of the Congress of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MEMORIALS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, a memorial was presented and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, urging the elimination of the long- and short-haul clause from the Interstate Commerce Act; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BELL: A bill (H. R. 7941) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay L. E. Durham and Margaret E. Durham for rent of premises occupied by Director of Farm Labor; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BEITER: A bill (H. R. 7942) to correct the military record of Ralph Irvin Brown; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. BERLIN: A bill (H. R. 7943) granting a pension to Malissa Agnes McMunn; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BREWSTER: A bill (H. R. 7944) granting a pension to Rachel A. Bosworth; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GRAY of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 7945) granting a pension to Carl L. Bodecker; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEA of California: A bill (H. R. 7946) for the relief of Adam Augustus Shafer; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. McGROARTY: A bill (H. R. 7947) for the relief of Rev. Harry J. Hill; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 7948) granting a pension to Mollie Sigmon; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7949) granting an increase of pension to Mary Hubbard; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SNYDER: A bill (H. R. 7950) granting a pension to David B. Lawson; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7951) granting an increase of pension to Ella Dean; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7952) granting a pension to George C. Shuckhart; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7953) granting a pension to Michael Gannon; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SOMERS of New York: A bill (H. R. 7954) for the relief of William S. Wrynn; to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

8294. By Mr. ARENDS: Petition of V. L. Dally, commander Fred Bennitt Camp, No. 3, United Spanish War Veterans, and members of Livingston County, Ill., asking for passage of House bill 6995, to restore pensions to veterans of the Boxer Rebellion and Philippine Insurrection; to the Committee on Pensions.

8295. Also, petition of residents of Bloomington, Ill., favoring enactment of Senate bill 600 and House bill 5600; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

8296. By Mr. BUCK: Memorial of the California State Legislature, memorializing the President and the Congress to enact legislation declaring Admission Day a holiday for all officers and employees of the United States whose headquarters are in California; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

8297. By Mr. CONNERY: Resolution of the Peabody Chamber of Commerce, Peabody, Mass., opposing the continuance of the cotton-processing tax; to the Committee on Agriculture.

8298. Also, resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, urging that the President of the United States be requested to utilize fully the powers vested in him by section 3 (e) of the National Industrial Recovery Act to apply embargoes or establish quotas as a means of protecting American manufacturers and thus American workers against the losses they now suffer from foreign competition; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

8299. By Mr. CULKIN: Petition by four citizens of West Amboy, N. Y., asking that an Executive order be issued which will grant all licensed practitioners of the healing arts equal rights and privileges in any social legislation involving these arts; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

8300. Also, petition of 12 residents of Jefferson County, N. Y., urging Congress to pass a uniform old-age pension law that must be adopted by the States before any Federal aid or relief is available; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

8301. Also, petition of the Watertown Aerie, No. 782, Fraternal Order of Eagles, Watertown, N. Y., urging support of the part of the social-security bill (S. 1130 and H. R. 4142) which provides for Federal monetary assistance to the States paying old-age pensions; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

8302. Also, petition of the Oswego Aerie, No. 498, Fraternal Order of Eagles, Oswego, N. Y., urging support of the part of the social-security bills (S. 1130 and H. R. 4142) which provide for Federal monetary assistance to the States paying old-age pensions; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

8303. Also, memorial of State Assembly of New York, requesting that the President and Congress of the United States repeal the charter of the North River Bridge Co., which was granted by the act of Congress of the United States (ch. 669, 1889-90, 51st Cong., and Public Act No. 350, 67th Cong., 1922); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8304. Also, petition of the Senate and the Assembly of the State of New York, requesting the President and the Congress of the United States to give favorable consideration to House bill 6914; to the Committee on Agriculture.

8305. Also, petition of certain residents of Watertown, N. Y., to extend the fundamental principles of the National Recovery Act either indefinitely or for at least another 2 years; to the Committee on Appropriations.

8306. By Mr. DOBBINS: Memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Illinois (S. J. Res. No. 21) advocating the modification of the fourth section of the Interstate Commerce Act; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8307. By Mr. HALLECK: Petition of citizens of Rensselaer, Ind., favoring pending legislation for the regulation of carriers in interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8308. Also, petition of Lorain Council, No. 10, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, of Logansport, Ind., favoring House bill 5921, to strengthen law for deportation of aliens; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

8309. By Mr. TRUAX: Petition of the National Cooperative Council, Washington, D. C., by their secretary-treasurer, Robin Hood, favoring the amending of the Banking Act of 1935 by a mandate to restore the purchasing power of the dollar to the 1921-29 level, and thereafter to maintain it at that level in relation to basic commodities, as contained in an amendment offered by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

8310. Also, petition of the Central Region Face Brick Branch, Canton, Ohio, by their secretary, J. Oatis Wilcox, strongly favoring the reenactment of the National Recovery Act in substantially its present form, with such additions and amendments as will compel stricter compliance thereto, as conditions in the Structural Clay Products Code are such that should the industry be deprived of the stabilization of minimum costs granted under the National Industrial Recovery Act, within a very short time a demoralized market would result, and many plants of the industry who have had no opportunity to recoup losses covering 5 years of depression would be placed in jeopardy of financial ruin; to the Committee on Labor.

8311. Also, petition of Harry W. Dunn, Toledo, Ohio, endorsing the program of the American Civil Liberties Union, and in accordance therewith protesting against any and all legislation tending to abridge the freedom of speech and press, such as House bills 57, 2866, 2897, 3036, 3056, 4313, and 6427; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

8312. Also, petition of Colonel Crawford Post, No. 181, American Legion, Bucyrus, Ohio, by their adjutant, Ferris H. Mollencopf, favoring House bill 7201, relative to amending section 6 of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as they feel certain that a man who is in charge of an Army band should receive the same recognition as any other leader of a military unit; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

8313. Also, petition of Monroe Pomona Grange, No. 23, Stafford, Ohio, protesting against such Federal regulation as proposed by Senate bill, as unfair, discriminatory, and unnecessary at this time, and as not being for the real interests of either producer or consumer, whether rural or urban, as it is their contention that such proposed Federal regulation of the motor carriers of freight, especially as to rates and practices, would result in serious handicap to the farmer, the stockman, and the horticulturist; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8314. By the SPEAKER: Petition of the city of Cairo, Ill.; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

8315. Also, petition of the American Petroleum Institute, New York City; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

8316. Also, petition of the citizens of the city of San Diego, Calif.; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MAY 8, 1935

(Legislative day of Tuesday, May 7, 1935)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Tuesday, May 7, 1935, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. LEWIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask for a roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Coolidge	King	Radcliffe
Ashurst	Copeland	La Follette	Robinson
Austin	Costigan	Lewis	Russell
Bachman	Couzens	Logan	Schall
Bailey	Dickinson	Loneragan	Schwellenbach
Bankhead	Dieterich	Long	Sheppard
Barbour	Donahey	McAdoo	Shipstead
Barkley	Duffy	McCarran	Smith
Bilbo	Fletcher	McGill	Steiwer
Black	Frazier	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Bone	George	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Borah	Gerry	Maloney	Townsend
Brown	Gibson	Metcalf	Trammell
Bulkeley	Glass	Minton	Truman
Bulow	Gore	Moore	Tydings
Burke	Guffey	Murphy	Vandenberg
Byrd	Hale	Murray	Van Nuys
Byrnes	Harrison	Neely	Wagner
Capper	Hastings	Norris	Walsh
Caraway	Hatch	O'Mahoney	Wheeler
Carey	Hayden	Overton	White
Clark	Johnson	Pittman
Connally	Keyes	Pope

Mr. LEWIS. Again I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], being engaged on an official mission to the Virgin Islands.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] are necessarily absent, and that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is absent because of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. What motion is pending before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2357, relating to an amendment to the Tennessee Valley Authority Act.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. As a privileged matter, I at this time enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill 3896, the so-called "bonus bill", was passed by the Senate yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. Was not a motion to reconsider entered yesterday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] gave notice that he would enter such a motion, but the Senator from Oklahoma has entered the motion. That is the difference between the two from the parliamentary standpoint.

AMENDED ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE NAVY DEPARTMENT (S. DOC. NO. 59)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying letter from the Acting Director of the Bureau of the Budget, transmitting, for the consideration of the Congress, certain amendments of the estimates of appropriations for the Navy Department as contained in the Budget for the fiscal year 1936, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Senate joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to enact Senate bill 626 and House bill 6909, which bills are proposed to aid the position of hop growers

Whereas the State of California has over 8,000 acres now planted to hops which produced in the year 1934 approximately 61,414 bales of hops or in excess of 12,282,800 pounds of hops and expended in excess of $1,500,000 for labor; and

Whereas the hop industry is now demoralized by low prices far below the cost of production and the hop growers of the States of Oregon, Washington, and California have asked that hops be made a basic commodity under the Agricultural Adjustment Act; and

Whereas Senate bill no. 626 and House bill no. 6909 were introduced at this session of Congress and said bills if passed will greatly improve the position of hop growers; and

Whereas the hop industry is in great need of protection at this time: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the President and Congress of the United States are hereby respectfully urged to enact the legislation proposed by Senate bill 626 and House bill 6909 as speedily as possible; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Senate of the State of California send copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that such Senators and Members from California be urged to support such legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, favoring the enactment of legislation providing for a national system of unemployment insurance, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See resolutions printed in full when presented today by Mr. WALSH, p. 7109.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, requesting the National Recovery Administration to grant to Massachusetts boot and shoe manufacturers and others relief from unfair competition, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See resolutions printed in full when presented today by Mr. WALSH.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the petition of John Fleming, of Wyoming, Del., praying for the enactment of old-age pension legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of San Diego, Calif., protesting against the enactment of House bill 7260, the so-called "social-security bill", and favoring the so-called "Townsend old-age-pension plan", which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Somerdale Community Baptist Church, of Somerdale, N. J., protesting against the holding of naval maneuvers in the North Pacific Ocean, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the States of California and Connecticut, praying for an investigation of charges filed by the Women's Committee of Louisiana relative to the qualifications of the Senators from Louisiana (Mr. LONG and Mr. OVERTON), which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of H. L. Hall, of Parkersburg, W. Va., praying for the immediate cash payment of adjusted-service certificates of World War veterans, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the executive committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, favoring the enactment of legislation providing for the relief of share-tenants and share-croppers in the cotton-growing areas, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Charlotte May Council, No. 97, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, of Jamestown; Bay Ridge Council, No. 16, of Brooklyn; and Queensborough Council, No. 86, of Jamaica, all in the State of New York, favoring the enactment of legislation to strengthen present immigration laws pertaining to the deportation of aliens, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Classis of Poughkeepsie (N. Y.) of the Reformed Church of America, favoring the enactment of legislation to take the profits out of war, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the same organization, expressing the hope that in connection with such naval maneuvers as may seem necessary in the Pacific Ocean any demonstrations likely to cause offense to the rulers and people of Japan be avoided, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Port Henry (N. Y.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the enactment of legislation to readjust import duties on pig iron and iron ores, so as to make possible the economic and profitable operation of the pig-iron plants and mines located in eastern and northeastern United States, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the local retail drug-code authority of the Thirty-sixth Congressional District of New York, of Geneva, N. Y., favoring an extension of the National Industrial Recovery Administration, which was ordered to lie on the table.

RELIEF OF BOOT AND SHOE MANUFACTURERS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD in full and appropriately referred resolutions from the Massachusetts General Court requesting the National Recovery Administration to grant to Massachusetts boot and shoe manufacturers and others relief from unfair competition.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions requesting the National Recovery Administration to grant to Massachusetts boot and shoe manufacturers and others relief from unfair competition

Whereas the boot and shoe manufacturing industry in this Commonwealth is faced with a grave crisis, after long being forced to struggle for existence against low wage scales which prevail in rural sections of Maine and New Hampshire, a situation made acute by the minimum wage scale sanctioned by the National Recovery Administration, which minimum wage scale some of said manufacturers in rural communities have made the maximum wage, thereby creating unfair competition under which Massachusetts manufacturers are undersold in the open market and lose many orders for shoes; and

Whereas employers, employees, factory owners, home owners, merchants, and other citizens suffer from such competition, and the evils of the present secondary post-war depression are thereby aggravated to an unbearable extent: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby earnestly and respectfully requests the National Recovery Administration to grant speedy relief to the leather boot and shoe industry of this Commonwealth, and respectfully submits that vertical differential in wages is preferable to the existing geographical population and sex differentials, that higher minimum wage scale based on the skill of the shoe workers is preferable to the present minima sanctioned by the National Recovery Administration, that uniform wages for all shoe factories throughout the Nation seem wise; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded forthwith by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the National Recovery Administration, to the presiding officer of each branch of Congress, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts.

NATIONAL UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE LEGISLATION

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD, in full, and appropriately referred, resolutions from the Massachusetts General Court, seeking national unemployment-insurance legislation.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions seeking national unemployment-insurance legislation

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts urges upon the Congress and the President of the United States to exercise their powers to provide for a national system of unemployment insurance; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth forthwith forward copies of these resolutions to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and to the Members thereof from this Commonwealth.

THE PETROLEUM INDUSTRY—PETITION OF PETROLEUM INSTITUTE

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a petition adopted by the board of directors of the American Petroleum Institute, at Chicago, Ill., on the 3d instant, dealing with the N. R. A., which, for the most part, has my approval.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PETITION TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, SUBMITTED BY THE AMERICAN PETROLEUM INSTITUTE
(Adopted unanimously by the board of directors in meeting at Chicago, Ill., May 3, 1935)

The American Petroleum Institute, with a substantial and representative membership from a $12,000,000,000 industry, which has more than 2,000,000 owners and over 1,000,000 employees, respectfully petitions Congress to pursue policies which will permit this industry to take its rightful place in the march of recovery.

The institute asks this with full appreciation of the earnest endeavors which have been made by the Federal authorities in the past 2 years to speed recovery. These efforts the petroleum industry has generously supported, recognizing that in a time of such emergency it had a patriotic obligation to cooperate in bringing about reemployment and restoring the country's purchasing power. Its annual pay roll, approximating $1,569,600,000, is practically equal to the 1929 pay roll and in real wages it is 7.2 percent higher. In fact, the per capita yearly wage paid by most of the oil companies has always ranked high in industry. In the past 2 years the industry reabsorbed 217,200 persons: Taxes on its properties, products, and operation contribute $1,250,000,000 annually toward the maintenance of Government.

The institute believes that the people who depend upon our 24,600,000 automobiles for transportation, the farmers who cultivate the land with tractor-drawn equipment, the operators of thousands of industrial plants, and the many other users of petroleum products are best served when competition is free, when the operation of economic law is unhampered, and when the profit incentive stimulates initiative and inspires invention. The free operation of these forces inevitably tends to insure quantity, improve quality, and to reduce prices. These are the true tests of the service rendered by any industry to the public.

Gasoline consumers cannot continue to enjoy these advantages if the responsibility of management is transferred from the thousands of individual companies to a Federal bureau.

These advantages can be assured if the Federal and State Governments will remain each in its own sphere, observing the separation and limitation of powers which the Constitution has wisely ordained and the Supreme Court by many decisions and precedents has clearly defined.

Legislative uncertainties, threats of governmental control, and interferences with the legitimate development of a great industry which has served the public satisfactorily are handicapping our business and retarding program toward a constructive solution of our problem.

Out of an intimate knowledge of conditions and a long experience in serving the American people we feel qualified to offer a program of principles, which will materially assist in stabilizing conditions under which the oil industry can operate to the direct advantage of both the makers and users of petroleum products.

We respectfully submit:

First. That there should be a minimum of regulation by Government, State or Federal, to the end that private industry may be free to serve the public most efficiently and economically.

Second. That the State governments, having the power to regulate production of crude oil and natural gas to prevent waste and so conserve a valuable natural resource, should be encouraged in that effort.

Third. That the Federal Government, having the power to deal with interstate and foreign commerce, and to authorize interstate compacts, should supplement the production-control effort of the States:

By making permanent and rigidly enforcing the Connally law (S. 1190) (Public, No. 14, 74th Cong.), prohibiting the shipment in interstate and foreign commerce of oil produced in violation of State laws;

By approving the interstate compact which has already been ratified by the legislatures of five of the principal oil-producing States;

By directing the United States Bureau of Mines, a competent fact-finding agency, to ascertain the crude-oil production necessary to meet the consumptive demand of the Nation and to make its findings available to the interstate compact commission and the respective conservation authorities of the oil-producing States;

By exercising control of imports to a proper ratio to domestic production for such a time as is necessary.

Fourth. That as concerns marketing, the field of greatest competition, there is no reason to single out the oil industry for special Federal intervention. That industrial pacts and agreements when voluntarily made by any industry for the purpose of eliminating unfair methods of competition should be permitted.

Fifth. That any such economic strait-jacket as is contained in S. 2445 or similar proposals for the enlargement of the N. I. R. A. would serve to increase the price of gasoline and demoralize the industry. In support of the foregoing we point to the record of the oil industry during the last 15 years as one of outstanding public service.

But for cheap gasoline many industries which have contributed substantially to American economic progress could not have enjoyed such remarkable development. Notable among these are automobile and tire manufacture and modern road building, with the related industries such as steel, textiles, plate glass, leather, and numerous accessories.

The production, transportation, refining, and distribution of petroleum and its products go hand in hand with the automotive industry. Important as it is that automobiles should meet all reasonable demands upon them, it is equally important that the car owner, wherever he may travel, should have access to a plentiful supply of gasoline and oil, of good quality, and at reasonable prices.

During the last 15 years the efficiency of American-made automobiles has steadily increased while their price has as steadily declined. Today, the United States makes 75 percent of all the automobiles in the world. During the same period the petroleum industry has supplied the car owner with gasoline and oil in ample quantities, of constantly improved quality and at steadily decreasing prices.

In 1920 the average selling price for gasoline exclusive of tax in 50 cities, representing all the States, was 29.7 cents per gallon; in 1934 the figure for the same cities was 13.6 cents—a drop of 54.2 percent. A barrel of crude petroleum now yields about twice as many gallons of gasoline as it did 15 years ago. No consumer of gasoline and oil can reasonably complain that he cannot readily procure a plentiful supply of each, of good quality, at reasonable prices. The average cost exclusive of tax of owning and operating a motor car today, mile for mile, is about one-fourth of what it was 15 years ago.

The free play of economic conditions under which these two great industries have so well served the consumer has been substantially the same. In both there has always been keen, unrelenting competition; and this, in turn, has stimulated new discoveries and new methods, has led to the development of new markets and has constantly tended to improve quality and reduce prices.

Because it has grown so fast, the oil industry has constantly needed large amounts of new capital. Its investment increased from $6,350,000,000 in 1921 to $12,200,000,000 in 1932. During these 12 years $2.94 of new capital was put into the industry for every dollar that was earned, and the annual average earning of the oil industry on its investment was only 1.66 percent. It is inconceivable that political management could operate a fast-growing and hazardous business on so close a margin as this.

In transportation particularly, which is such an important factor in costs, the oil industry has devised and developed its own unique systems, giving incomparably cheap movement by pipe lines, ocean tankers, and by barges on inland waterways.

Every resource of science and technology has been enlisted in the search for new supplies of oil in the earth. In fact, the chief offense imputed to the industry is that it has been all too successful in finding new pools.

With such a record it is apparent that the hands of the oil industry should not be tied by governmental bureaucracy. The issue between Government and private responsibility for this vast industry should not be obscured by vague declarations that the petroleum industry has become affected with a public interest justifying governmental control just because conservation has come to be recognized as a responsibility of government.

The distinguishing characteristic of petroleum and natural gas is their liquid and fugacious nature. In other mining industries the situations is entirely different; for instance, the owner of coal land is not subject to drainage, for he can keep his coal if he likes and his neighbor cannot take it. But when a well is drilled into an oil-producing area the "law of capture" permits the surface owner to draw the oil from his well even though it may drain the supply of the adjoining landowner. Therefore, the neighbor must drill and produce his share of the oil or lose it; and his neighbor in turn must do likewise. This was a situation beyond the power of the industry to remedy, and in all flush pools, before the conservation efforts of the States were effective, the "law of capture" resulted in unscientific and wasteful practices and overproduction. The oil-producing States and the industry itself have now come to an intelligent conception of what real conservation means. The industry believes that true conservation means the scientific control of production making for greater recovery, as well as efficient and economic utilization of crude oil.

It is the duty of the oil-producing States, in the public interest as well as in the interest of the industry, to prevent waste of crude oil and thereby conserve the supply. This duty is the obligation of government, and when that obligation shall have been discharged, there is nothing in the inherent nature of petroleum or in the conduct of the business which requires or justifies the oil industry being declared a public utility any more than in the case of any other producer or manufacturer of a commodity of general use.

In marketing gasoline, the problems are no different from those in the wholesaling and retailing of other commodities. Whether there are too many filling stations, whether there is waste in the number of retail stores that market clothing, groceries, beverages, or the like, is a problem that concerns our economic welfare as a whole and not particularly any one business. It is self-evident that the problems arising out of competition and the operation of economic laws in every hamlet in the country cannot be solved by a bureau at Washington which undertakes to regulate each minute detail of our vast and complicated business structure. There should be no economic tinkering and no political control.

Unfortunately, governmental agencies, once organized and endowed with some measure of authority, aspire to continue their existence and increase their authority. Any proposal to amend the National Industrial Recovery Act with provisions that convert it from what is theoretically a system of governmentally supervised, industrially self-regulated codes of fair practice into a system of Federal industrial dictatorship becomes a striking example of this tendency to encroach.

We have proceeded on the road to recovery sufficiently to consider methods of orderly development of business as a substitute for devices created in moments of national emergency and desperation. The time has come to consider the long-range view of American economic progress.

The oil industry is prepared to do its part, and demonstrate its confidence in itself and in the future of the country, if it can but know clearly that its efforts are not to be checkmated by constant change, bureaucratic dictation, or usurpation of power.

Congress has an unparalleled opportunity to aid recovery by a frank recognition of separate fields of Federal and State responsibility under the Constitution.

Respectfully submitted by order of its board of directors.

AMERICAN PETROLEUM INSTITUTE,
AXTELL J. BYLES, President.

COMPARISON OF ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN EUROPE AND THE UNITED STATES

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a notable address by one of the leading publishers of my State, Mr. Frank E. Gannett, publisher of the Gannett newspapers, at a dinner given by the Committee for the Nation and a group of national farm organizations, at Washington, D. C., May 1, 1935, on a subject which I am sure will be of interest and value to the Senate and to the country.

I have complied with the rule of the Joint Committee on Printing by securing an estimate from the Public Printer as to the cost of its publication.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Only a few months ago I returned from an intensive and extensive study of conditions in Europe. It was my privilege while in Europe to talk with nearly all of the leading figures in government. I had interviews with practically every member of the British Cabinet; with officers of the Holland Government; with Schacht, Dieckhoff, and Hess, of the German Government; with several members of the executive committee of the Soviet Government; with Schuschnigg, of Austria; with Mussolini and several of his subordinates; with Flandin and Laval, of France.

In the countries that I visited I talked also with many business men, with bankers, with newspapermen, and with the able representatives of our own country in Europe and the well-trained members of their staffs.

I wish I could transmit to you my experiences, could picture to you what I saw, and could relay to you the things I heard. Most of my interviews were confidential, so I may not quote anyone on any subject discussed.

One cannot take such a trip without being impressed by the nature of the governments in these countries and with living conditions. What I saw was frightening, and my experience has given me great concern and caused me many sleepless nights. I am not an alarmist, not a pessimist; rather I am conservative and optimistic, but my experience abroad make a deep and lasting impression on me.

No one knows what nazi-ism means until he has been in Germany. No one knows what it means for a nation to be deprived of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of religious worship until he has seen the way dictators work. It is difficult to describe the atmosphere that prevails. Everyone is terrorized and in fear every minute of the day. Someone may listen in on your telephone conversations. Letters may be opened and spies follow you if there is the slightest suspicion about your movements.

Men came to my room in the hotel who did not dare speak until they had carefully surveyed the room, tried the doors, and put a pillow over the telephone for fear a carefully concealed microphone might betray what they might say, as has happened in many cases. Every German must hail Hitler and salute. No one dares whisper a word against the "leader" to anyone about whom he is not sure. Children even have been accused of betraying their parents on the question of loyalty to the government.

Germany is a nation of 65,000,000 people—a wonderful people. We in America know there are no better citizens, no people with finer characteristics, than the Germans. They have made a great contribution to modern civilization. The German people are not warlike. They want peace as much as we do. Their reactions are much like our reactions would be in the same situations. But what I have said in criticism applies not to the German people as a whole, but to Hitler and his group that now rule Germany.

I saw no smiles in Germany, but I saw everywhere despair, discouragement, worry, depression, and fear for the future.

I left Germany fully convinced that I would never want to live under nazi-ism or a dictator like Hitler.

Then on to Russia. And I should say in all honesty that in going to Russia from Germany I felt as if I were getting out of prison. I sensed a relief in the atmosphere. But Russia is not a country in which you or I would care to live under present conditions. The Russian Government is tyrannical, despotic, dictatorial. There, too, they have taken away freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of thought. The Russian Government is ruthless in driving through its program which, I should add, I think ultimately will be successful.

Slowly but surely progress is being made toward improving the conditions of the Russian people. They have raised the hope that the Russians are to have more food, more shoes, more clothes, better homes, radios, automobiles—some day in the future.

But the condition of the Russian people still is pitiful. They are still in distress, and their standard of living remains miserably low, but they have hope and accept present conditions as at least somewhat better than under the Tsar.

But, with all the emphasis at my command, I want to say I would not care to live in Russia under sovietism.

In Italy I saw that Mussolini, with his charming personality and his forceful character, had accomplished much in the way of bettering conditions. During the first years of his dictatorship, Mussolini, in order to entrench himself, resorted to ruthless measures. He has been more lenient recently, but in Italy no one dares to oppose Il Duce or openly challenge his authority. And here again, freedom of speech and freedom of the press are abolished and the entire country is under the domination of one man—a dictator. No matter how much Mussolini may do in a material way to improve conditions by cleaning up cities, building playgrounds, bathing beaches, parks, and the like, I can't believe that anyone who has had a taste of democracy would care to live under such a regime.

So I came back to America convinced, as never before, that I don't want to live under nazi-ism, fascism, or communism. Life in these countries is not worth-while, and whatever may be said about a beneficent dictator, no American wants for one minute conditions that prevail under dictators.

I went to Europe primarily to look into the economic situation. I found England prosperous, and as you know, she is still prospering. Everyone seemed happy. Business was booming. The newspapers told of this factory and of that factory taking on more employees. Many new projects are being launched. The stock exchange was booming and speculation was approaching something like that prevailing in America in 1928 and 1929. Trade was improving, and there was evidence everywhere that England has recovered and is going forward.

It is true that Great Britain still has difficult problems in what are called the "depressed" areas—those districts surrounding the coal mines and the shipbuilding centers. In these fields recovery will be slow and even doubtful.

Ask intelligent English business men what brought about the recovery and invariably they will tell you that "going off gold" when they did and adopting a managed currency has been a great factor—probably the greatest factor—in bringing back prosperity.

I discussed monetary matters with many. In England the people seem to understand gold better than does the American business man. I found no one who thought England should return to the old gold standard for a long time, if ever. The managed paper pound is entirely satisfactory to a large percentage of British business men.

What I say about England of course applies to those countries which are closely tied to England and to the pound—the sterling area. Sweden, Norway, Denmark, as well as Australia, and other British colonies are marching along with London and enjoying recovery.

What did I find in the gold-bloc countries? I visited Holland, France, Switzerland, Italy, Germany, and Austria. What a contrast to conditions in England! Holland is still feeling the pinch of deflation. Her bankers insist that she cling to the gold policy of France and conditions continue, I am told, to get worse. Since I was there, Belgium has been forced to devalue the belga. The bankers in Holland said that Holland could stick for a long time on gold, but a walk up and down the streets of Amsterdam shows you that she is doing so at a frightful price.

In all the gold-bloc countries, business conditions are bad, and everywhere is that same evidence of depression, despair, discouragement that I saw in Germany. Look at France! For 2 nights, our party of four were the only people for dinner in the large dining room of the Ritz Hotel in Paris. The shopkeepers in Paris all complain, and all business men admit business conditions in France are bad; but for political reasons, France still clings to gold and again is paying a terrible price. In France, the fall of prices is still under way and will continue until there is devaluation of the franc.

In Italy, the financial situation is worse than is disclosed. You will remember that Mussolini in December called in all outside securities held by Italians. Gold in the Italian Treasury has been decreasing steadily, and sooner or later Italy must take some drastic steps to solve her financial problems. Business conditions in Italy, except as they have been stimulated by the Government, are bad. Price indexes will prove this.

In Switzerland conditions are the same as in the other gold-bloc countries. Business is almost at a standstill and depression is acute. There are no evidences of improvement or recovery.

My experience drove home to me most forcefully that the ills of Europe are due fundamentally to gold. Business conditions there were upset by the violent increase in the value of gold throughout the world. Gold became so valuable that it bought more of everything. In other words, one had to give more of everything for an ounce of gold. This brought a price collapse, and this price collapse which we experienced in America in 1929 likewise brought chaos to Europe. Conditions grew worse and worse, and this economic collapse is what brought revolution and a complete change in the governments of that part of the world.

During just the last few days we have had demonstrated to us what happened in Europe when the value of gold rose to unprecedented heights. We have been bidding for silver, and silver has risen in value with the result that China and Mexico, which are on a silver basis, are suffering terribly. When the monetary unit of value changes materially, an upset economic situation is inevitable, and the consequences can never be measured.

To sum it up, what I discovered was that the nazi-ism, the fascism, the communism which I saw actually in operation, and which so frightened me, really had come about through adversity, as a result of the upset of economic conditions in those countries. So I came back to America impressed by the fact that until we solve our economic problems, restore normal business conditions, and give everyone a chance to work for a living, until we make our economic conditions better, we shall not be safe from the revolutionary changes that have taken place in Europe.

Don't blame the soap-box orator or the long-haired radical or the Red agitator for bringing about these changes. These revolutions, these overthrowings of governments are made possible only by permitting conditions to develop so that the average man or woman becomes oppressed, disheartened, discouraged, and is driven to anything different that may afford a ray of hope. Democracy will never be safe anywhere unless it provides the opportunity for earning a decent living. The necessities of life must be available to all who want to work for them.

I don't pose as an economist or an authority on monetary matters. I am only a newspaper publisher, an ordinary business man who is studying our everyday problems just as you are studying them. To me it has been plain for a long time that these great booms and depressions, which have so upset the world and brought misery and death to millions, are due primarily to a fluctuation in our measure of value.

For some strange reason, people seem to have been ignorant, and many still are ignorant, of the fact that gold changes in value just as any other commodity changes in value, and that if we measure all values by gold we have a measuring stick that changes in length constantly.

Perhaps some fail to appreciate the full importance of prices. But, as a matter of fact, prices affect your life and my life profoundly. Of course, every business man knows the importance of price. When prices are out of line business stops. We can't have normal business until we have proper price adjustments.

During the price collapse which took place in this country from the fall of 1929 to the spring of 1933, we learned two lessons: (1) that prices fell unevenly, (2) that as soon as prices lose their normal relationship to one another, business is retarded, and if the maladjustment becomes sufficiently great business stops.

Beginning in 1929, prices did move far enough out of their normal relationship in this country so that by the fall of 1932 business here was practically at a standstill.

With such a condition existing only two possible courses of action in this country were open: (1) To force down debts, taxes, union wages, and all other prices which had not fallen to the level of those which had fallen, or (2) to bring back to their normal relationship with other prices those prices which had fallen.

We must remember that throughout the world we measure prices in gold. But we must also remember gold is a commodity, the value of which fluctuates with the supply and demand for it. For about 15 years prior to 1929, gold had a very low value and prices were high and in normal relationship. Business accordingly was good. In the meantime, the demand for gold had developed in Europe. It rose rapidly in value, and throughout the world prices measured in money based on gold began to collapse. Actually the prices of those things which were free to move fell very far and very rapidly until they were so far out of their normal relationship to debts and those prices which were held up by administrative control, that business could no longer go on.

Faced with this situation, the United States raised the price of gold. Prior to that, and since, 57 other countries have also raised the price of gold. Only Holland and Switzerland maintain their pre-war price for it. The response to raising the price of gold in every country has been more or less to restore the normal price relationship. By this I mean relationship between those prices which fell because they were free to move up as gold increased in value, and between debts and those prices which did not fall because they were administratively controlled. With the restoration of this price balance, every country which has raised the price of gold has made a start in improved business activity.

To illustrate what happened, between February 1929 and February 1933 the price of copper fell from 17.8 cents a pound to 4.8 cents a pound. From February 1933 to February 1935 it rose to 8.8 cents, or 83 percent. The performance of copper will be found to be duplicated by practically every commodity which had its price set in a free and open market.

Prices which did not fall as much as the price for copper have not risen from their low point as much as has the copper price, and other like prices, for the simple reason that they did not go down as far and therefore there is no reason why they should increase as much, even though the price of gold was raised.

This fact often confuses those who do not realize that changing the price of gold quickly affects only those prices which are subject to a minimum of administrative control.

For example, take the cost of living. This includes so many fixed charges that it changes slowly. The United States Bureau of Labor index of the cost of living in June 1929 was 170. It declined slowly and was 132 in December 1932. By last November, after it had had the opportunity to feel the effect of raising the price of gold, it had risen to only 139, an increase of 5 percent from the low point.

The simple fact that prices which are free to move are immediately affected by raising the price of gold unfortunately is often confused by other conditions. Take the price of cotton for example. From February 1929 to February 1932, cotton fell from 20.2 to 6.1 cents a pound, and by February 1935 had advanced to 12.6 cents a pound. Since a part of the cotton crop was restricted some erroneously believe that this factor alone was responsible for the improvement in the cotton. Yet the significant fact remains that the gold value of cotton throughout the world has increased less than 25 percent while the domestic price has more than doubled.

But I must hurry on to what is really the heart of what I want to say. And, indeed, it is not necessary to spend much time on what has been happening in this country. We are all too familiar with it. What we are all interested in is the future. And I believe that what our future is to be will be greatly influenced by what we do with our monetary situation.

The price of gold has been raised to $35 an ounce. The President has the right to raise it to $41.34 an ounce. However, this delegation of authority by Congress terminates in less than 2 years. Let us carefully consider in the light of these facts the kind of money it is possible for us to have in the future.

1. We can return to a definite price for gold fixed by law. So long as we use this single commodity for money—gold—our money will change in value whenever that commodity changes in value. Such a single commodity money furnishes protection against wild inflation such as Germany had but permits such maladjustments in prices from time to time as we have experienced during the past 50 years. Do we want again to experience such a period of deflation or collapse in prices as we have just been through?

2. We can use both gold and silver as alternates, as we once did, or we can make a fused money of the two. This would be a two-commodity money.

3. We can, as some propose, use 10 commodities for money. For example, the dollar might be composed of a pound of cotton, plus a pound of lard, plus a pound of copper, plus 6 pounds of wheat, plus 1 or 2 grains of gold, plus 50 grains of silver, etc. The value of such a money would be the average value of the given amounts of the groups of commodities used. It would be reasonable to expect that debts, life-insurance policies, etc., if paid in money of this kind, would have values that could be depended upon by both creditor and debtor.

4. In place of 1, 2, or 10 commodities, we can use as a measure of value an index of 50 or more of the most important basic commodities upon which our industrial life depends. We can then change the price of gold in order to keep the index number of such commodities reasonably stable.

Should we adopt such a monetary system—that is, a multiple-commodity dollar in place of a single-commodity dollar which we now have—I feel sure we would all prefer the changes be made by law rather than by administrative act. It would be desirable to design a system that will work automatically. The nearer such a system can be prescribed by law, the more likely it is to operate equitably.

To repeat, such a system automatically and by law would give us a dollar determined by the average value of, say, 50 basic commodities, and it would provide us with the best possible safeguard against inflation.

At present the gold on which our dollar is based is worth too much. Even with our devaluation of the dollar to date those prices which are free to follow the value of money are too much out of line with other prices for normal business activity. This situation may change in time. Gold may conceivably decline in value. If it does, prices will come back to their normal relationship, or might rise too high—then we would have too much of a business boom.

Therefore to prevent both the deflation which we have experienced and the inflation which will probably occur if gold should lose much of its value, we should seriously consider establishing by law a monetary authority which will give us both a sound and a stable currency.

I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, nothing is more important in our country today than the setting up of a monetary system that will function, that will restore confidence to business, rebalance prices, and prevent violent and disastrous price changes in the future. It is not as difficult or confusing as some think.

The farmers of the Nation understand gold and its effects on the prices of their commodities and on their lives. But some persons have their minds closed to facts, and blindly and vaguely talk about sound money and an honest dollar without knowing that our dollar of the past has been both unsound and dishonest because it has been a varying measure of value. It has been as if our yardstick were 36 inches today and tomorrow 24 inches.

America physically is not much different today from what it was when we were prospering in 1929. What has happened is that we have had a great collapse in prices and have suffered disastrous consequences. Restore prices that have fallen, stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar—not the price of gold—and commerce will resume its normal flow.

It is true we seem to be experiencing a slow cyclical recovery which ultimately comes when things wear out or get out of date. We have always experienced improvement after depressions, but it is a question whether we can stand the strain of the present situation long enough to wait for the completion of this slow-moving recovery.

Since 1929, each year 4,000,000 youths have come of age. Most of these have never had a job. We must give serious thought to their future and their attitude toward government and our economic system. We must see to it that these young men have a chance, and that normal employment is resumed, not by any artificial stimulation or radical methods, but by getting at the very root of all our troubles; by readjusting prices and reducing our debts so that the dollar we owe will be of the same value as the dollar we borrowed.

I like to dream of the great America that we shall have if we only use our intelligence in solving this basic problem and exercise wisely the liberties and privileges that our sacrificing forefathers passed down to us.

We are a nation great in population, incomparably rich in resources, highly efficient and unequalled in inventiveness. We lead the world in many lines of production; we have a high standard of living and the benefits of a marvelous educational system. We have enormous wealth, amazing adaptability, and great resourcefulness. Our fertile lands and variety of climate will produce almost everything man needs, while our great industries can fabricate everything manufactured anywhere on earth.

America is one of the most fortunate nations in all the world today. And yet in the midst of great abundance, in the midst of plenty of everything, we have millions on our relief rolls and nearly 12,000,000 unemployed.

It is all wrong, all dead wrong! What an indictment of our intelligence! What an indictment of our management! What stupidity! How shameful!

But I have unwavering faith in the America of tomorrow. We are going to solve our problems. We are going to correct those weaknesses in our system that bring about such unpardonable conditions. We have the brains to do it; all we need to do is to use them.

I can see in the not distant future a triumph of good old American common sense over our difficult problems. I can see the establishment of a monetary system that will make easier an exchange of goods, that will stimulate the flow of commerce, that will create business. I can see our factories going full blast, providing work for all, our farmers getting good prices for all the crops they can grow. I can see more millions enjoying automobiles, radios, and telephones, living in better houses, having their necessities filled, with more time for culture, education, music, recreation, leisure, travel, study, prosperity, and happiness.

All this is possible in this country of abundance, resources, wealth, without resorting to radical revolutionary measures. Indeed, a program that will bring this about is the only real safeguard for our institutions, the only thing that will save democracy. Let present conditions continue long and we, too, will succumb to a dictator, with all the frightful consequences that follow the overthrow of democracy.

God grant that we may see the light and follow the path of wisdom, for if America, too, fails, then freedom and liberty, free speech, freedom of thought, freedom of worship, all perish, and darkness comes over the earth.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SHIPSTEAD, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 2313) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, with respect to farm prices, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 590) thereon.

Mr. COPELAND, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1874. A bill to provide for the coinage of medals to be presented to Senator A. Harry Moore, certain officers of the New Jersey National Guard, Capt. John Bogan, Sr., and the members of the crew of the fishing boat Paramount (Rept. No. 591);

H. R. 65. A bill to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station on the coast of Virginia, at or near the north end of Hog Island, Northampton County (Rept. No. 592);

H. R. 2015. A bill for a Coast Guard station at the eastern entrance to Cape Cod Canal, Mass. (Rept. No. 593);

H. R. 3975. A bill to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station on the coast of Georgia, at or near Sea Island Beach (Rept. No. 594); and

H. R. 5444. A bill to authorize the Department of Commerce to make special statistical studies upon payment of the cost thereof, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 595).

Mr. COPELAND also, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7205) to amend the Ship Mortgage Act, 1920, otherwise known as "section 30" of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, approved June 5, 1920, to allow the benefits of said act to be enjoyed by owners of certain vessels of the United States of less than 200 gross tons, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 596) thereon.

Mr. DONAHEY, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7131) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain lighthouse reservations, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 597) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 2777) for the relief of Mildred Moore; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WHEELER:

A bill (S. 2778) to provide for the enforcement of the penal laws of the State of Montana on the Indian reservations in said State; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

RECEPTION FOR REAR ADMIRAL RICHARD E. BYRD

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair appoints the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] as the members on the part of the Senate of the special joint committee to greet Rear Admiral Byrd upon his arrival at the Navy Yard on May 10, 1935, as authorized by House Joint Resolution 274, approved today.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to submit to the Senate this morning some observations respecting the desperately important problem of the international-trade relations of the United States as affected by contemporary governmental policies.

I wish to call attention at the outset to the letter addressed to the President of the United States and published under date of April 30, 1935, by Mr. George N. Peek, special adviser to the President on foreign trade. Mr. Peek submits certain statistical information to the Executive, and he concludes his document with the following two recommendations:

First, the inauguration of a detailed study of our direct investments abroad and foreigners' direct investments in the United States to supplement studies now in progress of capital movements.

Second—

And I emphasize this recommendation made by the President's special foreign-trade adviser—

Second, a review of all national policies based in whole or in part upon our international creditor status.

Mr. President, I desire cordially to join in Mr. Peek's second recommendation. This indicates no lack of interest in the first, but it seems to me that the second recommendation is of utterly emphatic importance to the United States at the present time.

It seems to me that a review of all our national policies respecting trade is vitally needed because we are trying to go in two opposite directions simultaneously. It never has worked and it never will. We are trying to go in two opposite directions simultaneously, for example, when Mr. Peek, the President's special foreign-trade adviser, is insisting that we can achieve no foreign-trade advantage except by direct barter treaties, whereas the President's Department of State and the Department of Agriculture are proceeding on the diametrically opposite theory that we can achieve a recapture of foreign trade by multilateral so-called "tariff bargains" under the most-favored-nation treaties. These are incompatible objectives.

We are trying to go in two opposite directions simultaneously, furthermore, when we build up our domestic production costs and build them up artificially, and yet deliberately tear down the tariff protection behind which those costs must be reared.

Thirdly, we are trying to go in two opposite directions simultaneously when we artificially build up domestic prices, making foreign sales almost impossible at those domestic levels, and simultaneously pretend to assure our people that their prosperity lies in foreign sales in foreign lands, when it does not lie there at all but continues to lie in a prosperous United States at home.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LONG. What I understand the Senator to say is that we have done a number of things to raise the prices of domestic products, such as imposing processing taxes and many other things, and at the same time we are trying to reduce tariffs on foreign goods coming into the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; and I am going to demonstrate to the Senate the disadvantageous net result of the thing up to date, not in theory but in fact.

Mr. President, there is one other basis for these observations which I want to bring to the attention of the Senate. The Senate passed Senate Resolution 111 on the calendar day of March 29, 1935, at my instance. It called upon the administrative departments of the Government for authentic reports upon agricultural imports in general and respecting wheat and cotton imports, and production at home and abroad in particular. Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, Secretary of Commerce Roper, and Foreign Trade Advisor Peek have now responded in effective detail. I want to express my appreciation for the scrupulous attention which they gave to the request of the Senate for this information. I want to advise the Senate that the Peek report is now available as Senate Document No. 46, that the Roper report is now available as Senate Document No. 54, and that the Morgenthau report will be printed immediately and will be similarly available.

All this information is of vital consequence to the Senate and the country in a study of our complex and desperately important economic problems. It bears strongly upon the wisdom, or the lack of wisdom, in the reciprocal-tariff bargains which the Secretary of State already has concluded with Cuba, Brazil, Haiti, and Belgium, and which he officially announced on April 30 he is now negotiating with France. He also announced that a total of 18 such foreign agreements have been initiated.

I desire to submit some conclusions which it seems to me flow logically from this information submitted to us in response to Senate Resolution 111 and from other related sources, including previously reported international balance sheets heretofore created by Mr. Peek and given entirely too little previous attention.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. The able Senator from Michigan has recalled to the Senate that the request for information had been responded to quite freely and from his point of view in an admirable manner. I invite attention to the fact that the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] in the presence of the Senator from Michigan a day or two ago made a complaint here in the Senate in which it was insisted that in seeking similar information either the Department of State did not have it to give or was refusing to give it. I cannot permit the suggestion of an intentional discourtesy by our State Department officials. Will the Senator say whether he is met with any such claimed discourtesy and whether he deems such omission as charged was intentional or accidental?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the situation confronted by the Senator from Maine and the situation confronted by me were two totally different situations. I have never found the State Department unwilling to give the Senate any information available to them for release. The situation which the Senator from Maine confronted and which I suspect the Senator from Illinois would confront under like circumstances is that the Senator from Maine was asking for information respecting a prospective trade bargain which was in process of negotiation. The Department is not only unable to give that information, but it is my impression that under the implications of the action of Congress, inherent in the reciprocal-tariff law itself, it is not permitted to give the information.

Consequently I think the situation confronted by the Senator from Maine was simply the situation which confronts any American businessman, for example, when he wants to know whether or not the State Department is contemplating a negotiation which affects his economic welfare. He cannot find out until the final announcement of the accomplished fact by the Department, and that necessity is inherent in the operation of the law itself, as I recall. This would imply no lack of courtesy in the State Department. On the contrary, I testify that the State Department always responds to me with prompt, effective, and courteous reply whenever I ask for information. It would not otherwise reflect the character of the able, distinguished, and wholly conscientious gentleman who presides at its head.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the able Senator assume that one who would ask the State Department if they were contemplating some arrangement with another country and suggesting a complete response on what subject was contemplated and in what manner it would be executed, could be served that information merely because somebody might be contemplating asking for something with some nation somewhere sometime? In what way could the mere contemplation be defined, and with any result detailed? What has my able friend to say in response to this situation?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not clear that I follow the Senator's inquiry, but if I do, my response is this: Let me personify. The Senator from Maine was interested in knowing whether or not, in the negotiations for a reciprocal-trade treaty with Canada, it was contemplated that any reduction would be made in the American tariff upon potatoes.

The State Department is not only unable but, in my judgment, it is not permitted, under the implications of the law which was enacted by Congress, to state whether or not it is dealing with the potato tariff in its Canadian negotiations, and there can be no effective notification either to Congress or the country—and this is one of the vices of the arrangement—until the treaty is concluded and it is announced as an accomplished fact, and there is no further opportunity for review.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I am very much interested in what the Senator has said as to the terms of the law inhibiting information. I think it is exceedingly important, if true. I do not so understand.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me restate it. There may be no affirmative pronouncement in the law, but I distinctly recall that we tried to write into the bill on the floor of the Senate language which would provide effective notice to those agricultural or industrial commodities which were about to be victimized by one of these so-called "treaties," and the Senate declined to permit the language to be written into the bill. I conclude from that situation that the State Department might find support for a refusal to give effective notice in situations such as the Senator from Maine confronted, but I wholly dissent from the justification for the situation, and certainly it is the last word in unfair disadvantage perpetrated upon American commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield further to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, without lodging any complaint against the State Department, I understand it to be the practice of the State Department that during these negotiations no information is given out as to just what subjects are being covered.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think that is entirely correct.

Mr. BORAH. It may be the part of wisdom not to give out the information, but I do not believe it is inhibited by the law. The law leaves the matter entirely to the discretion of the President or Secretary of State. He may deem it unwise, in view of the fact that he is negotiating with a foreign power, to give out the information; but it is wholly a question of policy, and not, in my judgment, an inhibition of the law.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator probably will recall section 4 of the act approved June 12, 1934, commonly called the "Reciprocal Tariff Agreement Act", in which the following language is found:

Before any foreign-trade agreement is concluded with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act, reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentality shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to the President, or to such agency as the President may designate, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe; and before concluding such agreement the President shall seek information and advice with respect thereto from the United States Tariff Commission, the Departments of State, Agriculture, and Commerce and from such other sources as he may deem appropriate.

That is one of the provisions of the act, and it seems to contemplate an opportunity for persons to present their views to the President before any treaty or agreement is concluded. It does not, of course, require the State Department to publish its processes of negotiation. If it did so, that would interfere with the accomplishment of the purpose which might be in mind; but, according to my interpretation of the act, before an agreement is concluded under the act opportunity is afforded persons who believe themselves to be interested in the proposed agreement to present their views.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes, Mr. President; in general terms I think the Senator has stated the formula, and of course he has read from the law accurately.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator would not advocate requiring separate notice to be given to all those interested in the production or distribution of commodities of the intention to negotiate concerning arrangements which might concern those commodities. The Senator would not go that far?

Mr. VANDENBERG. This would be my viewpoint of the matter, Mr. President: Let us again personify the problem, because it is more easily understood when personified.

I saw this morning an announcement made by the State Department respecting its purpose to negotiate a reciprocal treaty with France. It is a general statement of a purpose to negotiate a treaty with France. Attached to it is a complete statement of all the exports and imports that have passed between France and the United States for a given period. There is a general invitation to any interested person to file his views respecting this contemplated so-called "tariff bargain." I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the fact that if I am a manufacturer, let us say, of automobiles, and I find automobiles on this general list which is attached to the notice, I can assume that my commodity falls within the jurisdiction of these negotiations. Acting upon that general notice, I can submit to the proper authorities any briefs or any arguments I see fit respecting the reciprocal dealings in motor cars with France; but there never comes a time when I am advised respecting any change in my particular status. I have chosen a very inapt example, because there is no tariff on motor cars; but, whatever the commodity, there never comes a time before the actual promulgation of the treaty when I know whether or not any change has been made in my economic status in respect to my protection. I never have any real day in court, as it were.

It seems to me that in sheer elementary, national self-defense, and in basic acknowledgement of the rights of our citizens, somewhere in the process, if I am to be traded out of my protection, I ought to have a specific chance—it need not be a public chance; it may be a private chance; it may be in executive session—it seems to me somewhere in this negotiation I should have an opportunity to confront the specific thing that the Department contemplates doing in my connection, so that perhaps I can rebut the thing that is contemplated, and demonstrate its suicidal tendency; and, if the Senator will bear with me, in a few moments I shall demonstrate precisely how already this failure to permit the presentation of the concrete case has literally threatened to destroy one American industry within the week.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator realizes, I assume, that the proposition which he is now advancing was involved in the question as to whether the reciprocal-trade agreements should be submitted to the Senate for ratification.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; I discussed that matter a little while ago.

Mr. ROBINSON. The conclusion on the part of the Senate was that should not be done, because it would occasion such delay as to make impossible the negotiation of agreements within time to conserve the trade interests of the United States.

Under the arrangement which the Senator says prevails, opportunity is afforded in every case to those interested in a given commodity to present their views as to whether, for instance, there should be a change in existing rates, a reduction or an increase. Of course it is probably true that an individual is not served with notice that it is proposed to reduce or raise the tariff on the commodity in which he may be interested, but he is given notice of the fact that such commodity is involved in the negotiation; and the argument comes back to the question as to whether every reciprocal-trade agreement should be submitted to the Senate, and its ratification consented to.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes, Mr. President. Nevertheless, I persist in my feeling that inasmuch as tariff protection is irrevocably vital to many American industries and to much of American agriculture, it is a dangerous as well as a despotic and tyrannical thing to lodge in any department of the Government the power and the authority to strike down that protection without a full, fair day in court, when the striking down of the protection may be the striking down of the industry or the agricultural commodity itself. Furthermore, I remind the Senator that in many instances these reciprocal agreements, so far as the other party to the agreement is concerned, have to be submitted to legislative authority in some other country before they become effective. We are the ones who have declined to continue this basic democracy of protection in respect to our economic welfare.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course the Senator realizes that our principal competitors in foreign commerce have simple and prompt means of entering into agreements like the reciprocal-trade agreements which are contemplated by the act under discussion.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is true in some instances, and in other instances legislative consent is necessary.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Just a moment. The last thing I contemplated this morning, Mr. President, was to detour into a discussion of the administrative functions of this proposition, because the thing I wish to lay at the bar of the Senate today is the proof of what is happening to us in our trade, so that we can at least face the consequences with our eyes open.

I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I am disappointed that the Senator does not make his complaint more with regard to the Department being allowed to change the tariff, because, after all, if we are going to give the bureaucrats the right to wipe out these businesses, as they have been given that right, and strip Congress of this power, the absurd abuses are going to continue.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I entirely agree with the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I may say in reply to what the Senator from Louisiana has just said that I do not think any arbitrary practice in the matter is being pursued, nor do I think it is contemplated. The separate agreements, as they are advanced, receive very painstaking consideration.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, let me say that from my point of view they are inherently bound to be arbitrary, and are bound to continue to be arbitrary so long as the power of decision rests with appointed officers of the Government, who are not responsible to the American people by direct mandate.

I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. In reply to my friend from Arkansas, I understand that we imported about as much meat as we paid our people to kill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am coming to that, Mr. President. That is one of the facts which I wish to lay before the attention of the Senate this morning; and the contemplation quite transcends the administrative argument, if the Senator will permit me to say so.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. In support of what the Senator is saying with reference to the arbitrary administration of the law, I think I can agree with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that painstaking effort is made by the State Department. I am not, therefore, persuaded that the administration is arbitrary in the sense of deliberate desire to act capriciously; but the fact remains that Congress delegated this power to the President and to the executive department without any rule of conduct, without any provision that the duties arrived at should represent the difference between the cost of production abroad and at home, as was the law under the flexible-tariff provision; and that, because there is no rule, and because the State Department is permitted to make agreements based upon ipse dixit and upon some economist's idea concerning trade advantage, in very necessity every process is arbitrary.

It never will be otherwise so long as this law is continued in force. So, the Senator from Michigan is, in my judgment, completely justified in saying that this procedure is arbitrary. It inevitably must be; it cannot be otherwise.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I concur in the analysis contributed by my able friend the Senator from Oregon.

Let me now get to the kernel of the information I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate, and let me ask the Senate to consider whether this information does not support the following conclusions; and I am stating the conclusions first so that my colleagues can determine for themselves whether the evidence fits into the conclusions, and sustains them.

First. That American agriculture is threatened with the loss of its effective control of its own domestic American market because of foreign agricultural imports which are coming in in greater degree than ever before in the history of the United States, and which must be met by increased tariff protection if American agriculture is to save its domestic market.

Second. That the same jeopardy threatens American industry and American labor, not only in harassed textiles, to which the country is giving wide-spread attention, but also in other exposed commodities.

Third. That this menace is emphasized and increased by the so-called "tariff bargains" which are being negotiated by the State Department in sympathy with free-trade ideas of its distinguished, and, I may say, lovable, Secretary.

Fourth. That the reliance upon the restoration of export trade for the restoration of domestic prosperity is a fallacious conception, because most of this trade is permanently lost to us, in favor of foreign countries, which are rapidly and successfully striving toward their own self-containment.

I intend to submit the proofs, I advise my colleagues, to sustain this conclusion, if I can.

Fifth. That we must develop our own relative self-containment, whether we like it or not; that we must build our policies with constant, paramount concern for the restoration of our own domestic market, which contributes 93 percent of our normal prosperity; and that American agriculture can be saved only by going to a two-price system instead of relying upon a one-price system, which becomes a world-price system whenever we have a surplus.

I ask whether the available evidence which I shall now submit does not trend toward these conclusions. If so, the present administration's policies sharply and dangerously err. The errors are errors of commission where adequate tariff protection is withdrawn and errors of omission where adequate tariffs are not supplied.

Mr. President, one further preliminary word to indicate that this is no one-man contemplation which I am submitting to the Senate. I have already read from the report of George N. Peek, the official foreign-trade adviser to the President, who has indicated himself to be squarely in dissent with much that is going on. I now wish to read just a brief paragraph which recently appeared in the Washington Star, under the column edited by Mr. Paul Mallon, who usually speaks with considerable authority and who suggests that there are some contemporary White House doubts upon the subject. I quote Mr. Mallon:

Five big cotton men went to the White House about 10 days ago to protest to Mr. Roosevelt against the farm-control program. They stressed particularly the big decline in cotton exports and possibly permanent loss of our foreign markets because other nations are planting more cotton. They argued that the cotton industry was facing permanent difficulty because 60 percent of its production has been exported in the past.

Mark this—

The President is said to have left them with the idea that foreign trade was a thing of the past. Whether rightly or wrongly, they got the view that the President believed the United States would eventually have to reconcile itself to the prospect of living largely within itself.

Most foreign-trade experts have come to that view, although they do not dare say so openly.

In whatever degree this may be true, Mr. President, the hour is here to face the facts, and it is the facts, now made officially available in response to a Senate resolution, to which I am undertaking this morning, in a very humble fashion, to direct the attention of my colleagues.

First, just a brief snapshot of the Cuban so-called "tariff bargain", and the net result of it to the United States. I am speaking of the boasted fruits of the recent reciprocal tariff with Cuba. They are the kind of fruit which turn to ashes on the lips, and they have turned already, at least in part.

I do not speak merely of the tender solicitude which the administration has exhibited for Cuban sugar, largely owned in our own Wall Street. That of itself is a sad commentary upon our common sense, as I see it; and I say this with the greatest respect for the able and conscientious and earnest gentlemen who preside in both the State Department and the Department of Agriculture.

We deliberately limit domestic sugar production, and thus deliberately demonetize American agriculture in a commodity which is not on a domestic-surplus basis. We raise but 25 percent of our own sugar consumption, and instead of encouraging the American farmer to produce more we deliberately put him in a strait-jacket and order him to produce less.

Then we reduce the tariff on Cuban sugar, although the President said in his preelection campaign that to reduce the protection upon any agricultural commodity would be ridiculous. So the Cuban sugar flows in, and Cuba rejoices.

Then, under the tariff bargain theory, some other Americans are supposed to get the benefit of these favors which are extended to another country at the expense of our own farmers. That is the theory. Let us see what has happened.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. It is reported that the Secretary of State in a recent public speech made the statement, in substance, that it was not the policy to increase imports of any product that would come in direct competition with our home products. Has the Senator any information in regard to that?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall show the Senator in a very few moments precisely what a broken reed that is to lean upon. Let us see about this Cuban tariff bargain.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the able Senator also touch the matter of our relations with Brazil?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall hope to do so. At the recent meeting of the United States Chamber of Commerce in Washington, Mr. R. A. Anderson, president of the American Chamber of Commerce of Cuba, at Habana—and I now read from a newspaper report—"praised the Cuban reciprocity treaty, explaining at the United States chamber meeting that trade between the two countries, through last September, October, November, and December, when the pact was in effect, was 90 percent greater than in the corresponding period of 1933."

Mark you, the claim for this particular tariff bargain, to wit, the Cuban bargain, is that in the first 4 months of its existence it succeeded in increasing Cuban-American trade 90 percent.

Very well. Let us examine that. The general fact is true: It did increase Cuban-American trade 90 percent. It increased Cuban-American trade about $26,000,000. But it resulted in an increase in the Cuban imports coming into the United States by $16,000,000, and an increase in the American exports going into Cuba by only $10,000,000. So that at the end of this famous, fertile, fruitful, 4-month demonstration of the utility of this tariff bargain, our trade balance with Cuba was $8,000,000 worse off than it was before this beneficial thing was undertaken in behalf of our own foreign trade.

Mr. President, when we contemplate this bargain in that phase I am reminded of nothing quite so much as the final stanza in Southey's poem about the Battle of Blenheim, when he said:

"But what good came of it at last?"

Quoth little Peterkin.

"Why, that I cannot tell," said he;

"But 'twas a famous victory."

Yes, the kind of victory, I think, Mr. President, which Pyrrhus spoke about at Asculum when he said, "Another such victory and we are undone."

In connection with this Cuban treaty, Mr. President—and I mean to attempt to be scrupulously fair in the presentation of these facts—there is no question but that automobile exports to Cuba have increased, and I am supposed to lead the cheering section in behalf of this treaty because my State makes so many automobiles. Mr. President, I am very happy indeed that the State Department is giving solicitous consideration to the automobile export trade in connection with these bargains, because if there is a national commodity it is the motor car, inasmuch as it draws upon the entire country for the supplies which enter into its production. I am very glad that the automobile industry has been able to sell more motor cars in Cuba, and I think I ought to say that the motor industry entirely disagrees with the argument I am making today. It applauds Secretary Hull and his entire policy.

From my point of view, however, Mr. President, I am bound to believe, and I think the motor trade itself ultimately will believe it—I am bound to believe that if we sell more motor cars in Cuba as the result of taking away, for example, the power of domestic farmers to produce sugar, we will lose more automobile sales in 16 sugar States of the United States than we could ever compensate for by a few additional export sales to Cuba; and that same philosophy applies to the entire contemplation. In normal times we depend to the amount of 93 percent upon the domestic market for our business. At the very peak we have never depended upon the foreign market for our prosperity to a greater extent than 7 percent. Yet here is an announced trade policy which undertakes to subordinate the 93-percent domestic market to the 7-percent export market, and to forget the basic welfare of the 93 percent while trying to fish for some of the 7 percent, and, Mr. President, I have indicated by these figures already, in one instance, just how futile the fishing expedition is going to be. I may be wrong; but I cannot escape this conviction.

Before I leave Cuba I desire to say that the very distinguished Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Sumner Welles, writes me today and insists, from his viewpoint, for which I have great respect, that the reciprocity-treaty arrangement with Cuba still is of advantage to the United States, and he asks to give me some additional figures which I am very happy to present in the RECORD. He says:

Comparing the first 7 months of the agreement, September 1934 to March 1935, with the similar period of a year ago, December 1933 to March 1934, it is found that United States exports to Cuba increased $14,000,000, or 87 percent, and Cuban exports to the United States only 68 percent.

So that in terms of percentages we arrive at an argument which seems to defend this treaty as a useful thing for the United States. But, Mr. President, percentages may be tricky things. The net result of the application of a percentage depends entirely upon what we apply it to, and here are the figures which I obtained this morning for this same 7 months' period from the Department of Commerce, in dollars and cents, respecting this trade.

Our exports to Cuba increased from $17,000,000 to more than $32,000,000, and that, I take it, is the $14,000,000, or thereabouts, of which Mr. Welles speaks. But how about the imports coming in from Cuba, not in terms of percentages, but in terms of dollars and cents? They increased during this same period from $36,000,000 to $60,000,000. In other words, they increased $24,000,000 against us as compared to $14,000,000 in our favor. So that again we find ourselves $10,000,000 worse off in the net final balance of trade, and that is what tells the story as to whether or not one of these arrangements is successful.

Mr. President, let us now look at another of these treaties and see what has happened—the Belgian reciprocity treaty.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the point he has just been discussing, will he yield to me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. In what does that increase from $36,000,000 to $60,000,000 largely consist?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have the information, Mr. President, and I am expecting to reach it in connection with another phase of the matter. Perhaps I can find it at the moment, but if the Senator will indulge me I think if I reach it in order I can save time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let us now look at the Belgian treaty. That is only a week old. Let us see what has happened in 1 week in the United States, which, after all, is our primary consideration and our initial responsibility. When this Belgian tariff bargain was written it was evidently decided that it would be a perfectly safe thing to sacrifice the parchment-paper business of this country, because it is such a little industry relatively speaking. I suppose it was considered that the parchment-paper industry was scarcely worthy of consideration in respect to the ultimate complaint which might arise out of trading one American manufacturer out of his market in favor of some other American manufacturer who is designated as a beneficiary of this arrangement.

What happened in connection with the parchment-paper industry in the United States? There are just four parchment factories in the United States: One is at Kalamazoo, Mich., one is at Bristol, Pa., one is at West Carrollton, Ohio, and one is at Los Angeles, Calif. The duty was reduced about one-third in this bargain with Belgium. That was just enough to make it impossible for American industry to make and profitably sell parchment paper in prospective competition with the world.

Furthermore, here enters another phase of the vice of these so-called "multilateral tariff bargains." When the Department made this bargain with Belgium, assuming to get something back from Belgium in return for it, under this present amazing arrangement they had to extend to 60 other nations all the advantages they gave to Belgium, and they did not get anything back from the other 60 nations at all. Britain and Finland, present and prospective parchment-paper makers, get all this same Belgium favor in our markets and give up nothing for it all.

If that is Yankee horse trading, then I do not think I know it.

Mr. LONG. That is the new deal.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, it is the "raw deal" also.

Mr. LONG. Yes. They are synonymous.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What happened? Mr. President, I communicated with these four parchment-paper institutions. I find that in every instance within 1 week there has been a general discharge of employees. I quote from the further reply of the West Carrollton Parchment Co.:

We are this morning, because of this treaty, canceling a contract for a $20,000 addition to our mill, which would have given 60 to 90 days' employment to a number of people and given general employment thereafter to the employees of the mill.

This is what has happened to the vegetable parchment-paper industry in the United States as related to me by one of the representatives of the factory which happens to be in my own State. This is their logic. They say, "We are perfectly sure that Congress in its wisdom within the next 2 or 3 years is going to repeal this sort of fatal tariff legislation and restore the protective theory in American industry. So sure are we of this recuperation of economic common sense that we do not propose, if we can help it, to permit this new foreign parchment paper to establish its trade connections and its trade habits in the United States. So without waiting for any of these imports to come in we are anticipating the net result by reducing our own prices, striking down all of our own profit, curtailing our production, and maintaining a skeleton of operations, just for the purpose of trying to hang on until this system again changes."

So what is the net result? No advantage to Belgium, because they are not going to sell their stuff after all in this country. Just a net disadvantage to American labor and American capital and American commerce.

In this situation, which has developed within 1 week in respect to one industry which I have been able to probe and define, I wonder what is happening generally as a result of this sort of tariff manipulation? Before I leave the Belgian matter, I wish to read a brief excerpt from a publication called "Steel Facts":

The recent trade agreement between the United States and Belgium, which lowers duties on imports of various iron and steel products, brings a serious threat of less work and smaller earnings for thousands of employees in American steel mills.

The treaty, which goes into effect May 1, 1935, reduces import duties on many steel products from $1 to $3 a net ton.

Now—

From 1930 through 1934, imports—of pig iron, scrap, and rolled-steel products amounted to 2,068,935 tons.

Imports—

This meant that 57,000,000 man-hours of work and $36,000,000 in wages, at present rates, were lost to American workmen.

These imported products were sold by the foreign steel makers and shipped to the United States to sell at prices ranging from $5 to as much as $20 a ton under American prices.

Yet, Mr. President, in face of that exhibit, we now further reduce the differential which is necessary to keep these American workmen employed in their own steel mills and to put back the workmen who have been displaced; and it is perfectly obvious why. Because it is here indicated that the average foreign wage scale in a foreign steel mill is 17 cents per hour, as compared to the average of 65 cents per hour in the United States.

And that is not all. We deliberately passed an N. R. A. law for the purpose, theoretically, of doing something for American industry and American commerce, and under it we add arbitrarily to the American cost of production. Of course, we wrote into that law a provision that the President of the United States could, if he wanted to, offset this arbitrary, artificial factor with comparable tariff protection, but he has never done it.

Not only that, but we wrote the A. A. A. law with precisely the same net result, even more so, because under the A. A. A. law we not only add our processing taxes to the cost of production of American agriculture but we also permit a bureaucrat down at the other end of the Avenue, at his own will and option, to add a so-called "compensatory tax" to any other processed commodity which, in his benign judgment, may seem to be in competition with the commodity which is taxed by a direct processing tax, in each instance adding to the domestic cost.

Not only that, but there is pending here now, Mr. President, so-called "social-security legislation" which intends, under the text of the pending bill, to add 9 percent to the pay rolls of the United States by way of tax with which to pay the security bill. Will Senators tell me how American industry can survive an artificial arbitrary 9-percent payroll tax? We are not discussing the merits of the proposal itself. I am asking how American industry can survive a 9-percent added, arbitrary, artificial, differential as compared to the pay rolls in other countries, and hope to survive and provide pay rolls for anybody in our own country unless we revert to the honest basis of legitimate tariff protection, which does equalize the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad?

Now, Mr. President, there is the Belgian situation. I have discussed the Cuban Treaty and the Belgian Treaty.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator has alluded to the four organizations or units engaged in the production of parchment paper. Has the Senator any facts before him to show the profits which have been made by each or all of these institutions during the past 3 or 4 years and anterior to that time, say, from 1923 to 1929?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President, I have not; but I have personal knowledge respecting one of them, and I know that in one instance they have made a brave effort to maintain the operation of their unit through these years of depression, despite the loss which was piling in upon them; and, insofar as the present balance sheet of these lesser institutions generally is concerned, I suspect that there is no possible question left regarding what I know the Senator has in mind, to wit, the making of a tariff-induced profit which is out of line with equity and fair play.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment further, without reference to any particular industry, since the negotiation of the treaties referred to the Senator will recall that during the tariff discussions and during the tariff hearings of 1922 and 1929 the evidence was piled mountain high that many of the great industries of the United States had made not only extortionate profits but profits which could not be defended at all by the application of common sense or ethical principles. Those enormous profits were made, as the evidence shows in the cases to which I have referred, by reason of their high tariff duties, which constituted an embargo on imports and permitted them, behind the bulwark of the tariff, to filch the American consumer.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have not any quarrel with the able Senator from Utah respecting tariff protection which produces the type of result to which he has adverted. I am opposed to it. I stand upon the rule that there can be no America in the terms we have known it for 50 years unless there is a tariff which measures the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. It is that rule for which I contend, and it is that rule which has been stricken down under the present regime. There is no rule under that regime. The tariff bargain is made without direct respect to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and the Senate declined to order the Department to write its tariff bargainings on the basis of the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. It is a process of pick and choose; you are lucky if you are picked for a favor, and it is just too bad if the Department down yonder decides to mark you for discrimination and disaster.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LONG. As an example, Mr. President, the people of southern Texas and Louisiana and of Florida developed a fruit and vegetable business, citrus fruits, and the like. The administration has negotiated them practically entirely out of that business by reciprocal treaties which have been made with Cuba and with other countries. That action has destroyed a business which it took millions of dollars to build up, and it is doubtful if they will ever again be able to restore that business if the reciprocal-treaty arrangements stand for very long.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Now, Mr. President, I wish to come to the other contemplation, which is the general contemplation, that through a failure of adequate protection today our markets are being dangerously flooded from other lands. I shall be very happy to have the considerate attention of my friend from Utah [Mr. KING] as I submit these facts, because I know he is fair-minded in spite of his prejudice against tariff protection, and I know that he will perceive in these facts and figures an irresistible demand that something be done different from what is being done today.

Regardless of incidental and spotted advantages which may come to us from these tariff bargains, every one of which is founded upon the theory that America cannot fully recover unless she lets in more imports so that she can sell more exports, I submit to the Senate that we have everything to lose and precious little to gain from this type of governmental thinking at the present time; first, because there is a provable and obvious need today for more rather than less protection of the domestic market; second, because foreign trade, at best, constitutes but 7 percent of our economic reliance, and the chances are 14 to 1 against us when we magnify foreign trade at the expense of domestic production; and third, because much of our old foreign trade cannot be captured because it no longer potentially exists. Much of it has been specifically killed off by our own agricultural antics during the last 2 years. Do not misunderstand me. I am eager for foreign export trade. It is highly desirable. We need it. But we do not want it at a net loss.

I do not ask the acceptance of the old-fashioned platitudes upon this score. I ask only for a facing of the facts, particularly in respect to American agriculture, which must prosperously recover before any stabilized prosperity can be available to anyone else.

Now, let us see what is happening, Mr. President. Let me show from the official reports which have been made to the Senate precisely what is going on. Scan these reports for a moment with a serious eye. I submit they prove a trend of competitive agricultural imports, which calls for quick, sharp expedients of domestic protection before the trend develops into a major, devouring, devastating menace.

Now, listen. These figures are from the official reports of Secretary Morgenthau to the Senate of the United States within the week.

During January and February of 1935 alone cattle imports into the United States amounted to $729,500, as compared with only $591,000 for all 12 months of the previous year. Cattle are coming into the United States at a time when, up to April 18, we have spent $111,000,000 at home to destroy cattle and to take care of the destruction of cattle. The imports were nearly 30 percent greater in 2 months than they were in all of last year.

What about canned meats? Canned meats came into the United States in January and February in this year to the tune of 8,390,000 pounds. This is at the rate of 50,000,000 pounds a year of canned meats coming into the United States at a time when we are supposed to have a domestic crisis and have to pay millions of dollars out of the United States Treasury in order to meet the domestic prices.

Butter: During January and February of 1935 butter came into the United States over the tariff wall at the rate of nearly $4,000,000 a year compared with $160,000 in all of 1933 and $183,000 in all of 1934. What are we going to do about that? What is the use of talking about salvation for the dairy farmers in the face of the irresistible and unanswerable fact that dairy products are coming in over the tariff wall at an infinitely greater speed in 2 months of the year than they came in during the whole of the previous year?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GIBSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. What about prices? Have not the prices to the American farmer and dairyman advanced considerably during the last 2 years?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think they have, but what of it?

Mr. McKELLAR. If they have advanced is not that the principal thing? Is it not the principal thing in which the farmer is interested, that he is getting better and better prices for the commodities he raises? Is not that what happened not only as to butter, but as to practically every other farm product?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am very much obliged for the Senator's question. He is exactly right. The thing that is happening to American agriculture right under the eyes of the Senator from Tennessee is that the domestic prices have increased to a point where they have become so alluring and so advantageous to the foreign importer that he is bringing in the stuff and now sells it under the nose of the American farmer and takes his market away from him. The American farmer likes the increased prices to which the Senator from Tennessee refers, but that increased price is of no use if the foreigner gets the sale.

Mr. McKELLAR. The foreigner is not selling the stuff.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have just proved that he is.

Mr. McKELLAR. The American farmer produces the butter and is getting more for it today—I shall have the figures here in a few moments to prove it—than he was getting 2 years ago.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What is the Senator trying to prove?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am proving that the policies which have been made effective by what the Senator contemptuously referred to as the new deal for the benefit of the farmers of the United States are making them infinitely better off than they were when the old conditions existed which the Senator from Michigan wants to restore.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Tennessee, as usual, wants to talk politics. I am not interested in politics, and I have not referred to the new deal since I started to speak.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am talking business.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am talking business, and I am asking the Senator to confront the facts. Here are some more of them.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I should like to say to the Senator from Tennessee that, comparing the average amount of products which the farmer can sell today at the prices for which he can sell them today, proves only that he can buy with the money received today less than he could before the "new deal" or the "raw deal" was ever heard of. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Louisiana may have that opinion.

Mr. LONG. It is the fact.

Mr. McKELLAR. The truth is the farmers of America know they are getting more now for their products than they were getting 2 years ago.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I decline to enter into that field of argument, because I am not at the moment interested in it. I agree with the Senator from Tennessee in respect to the relative advantage of the farmer today compared to what it was a little while ago, in some fields. This is chiefly due to subsidy payments from the Public Treasury. The thing I am bringing to the Senator's attention is the international situation which now threatens that thing which the Senator boasts to have arrived, and in whatever degree it has arrived I want to see if we cannot save it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is the American farmer who raises the American products and is selling them at very much better prices than he has for a number of years.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, it is the American farmer to whom the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Louisiana refers—

Mr. LONG. I represent some of them, and I know what they are doing.

Mr. VANDENBERG. This farmer confronts the following situation in respect to tallow: During January and February of 1935 the imports of tallow were at the rate of nearly $8,500,000 a year compared with $7,460 for all of 1923. I know the Senator from Tennessee is not satisfied with that contemplation. In pounds we imported in 2 months, January and February of 1935, 31,615,000 pounds of tallow, compared with 238,000 pounds in all of 1933. I know the Senator from Tennessee is disturbed by that contemplation just as much as I am.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I am interested in the figures the Senator gave. Does the Senator have the figures showing the total amount of tallow consumed by the country during the year, so we can get an idea of the comparative amount of imports?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; I have not, but I think the Senator, as usual, has put his finger upon a pertinent factor. I think the figures for the time being compared with the total production or consumption figures are not particularly formidable in their ratio. The thing I am calling to the attention of the Senate is that if we observe such a tremendous trend in 2 months in the direction of these agricultural imports, we are upon notice—and that is what I am saying—to inquire whether or not it does not constitute a menace and a hazard to agriculture in the lengthened shadow of this present experience. What is calculated to happen to our agriculture next week and next month and next year? Is it not under progressive threat from abroad?

Corn: We spent $253,000,000 from the Public Treasury for corn-hog benefits last year; that is, $253,000,000 in the corn-reduction program. That demonstrates how completely we feel the importance of the corn problem in the United States. In January and February of this year our corn imports were at the yearly rate of 22,000,000 bushels as compared with 160,000 bushels in 1933. I am not asserting that the 22,000,000 bushels imported is a formidable figure in respect to the total corn production or consumption per annum in the United States. I am asserting that when the imports in 2 months can jump from an average of 160,000 bushels per year to an average of 22,000,000 bushels per year, we are put upon notice, as Mr. Peek said in his letter to the President, to find out what is going on and to determine whether it is necessary for the exercise of the power inherent in the A. A. A. Act itself to increase tariffs to compensate for processing taxes and the like.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. I am interested to know if the Senator can state what our exports of corn were at that particular time.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the total number of bushels of corn raised in the country. My recollection is it was about 3,000,000,000 bushels.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I make no point of the related figures between the domestic production and the imports at the moment. I am pointing out the trend. I ask Senators who do me the honor to listen to see that this trend seems to apply to everything in agriculture.

Oats: We imported 3,762,000 bushels in 2 months, as compared with 132,000 bushels in all of 1933.

Barley: We imported 1,250,000 bushels in 2 months, as compared with 24,000 bushels in all of 1933.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President—

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the able Senator from Michigan if he has had time to consider how far the imports to which he is now alluding bear relation to the drought in the drought-affected area of the land which completely removed that area from cultivation, leaving us without return from the particular States that were so blistered by the drought?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes, Mr. President; I am perfectly sure that both of the droughts affect this matter—one the drought which comes by act of God, and the other the drought which comes by act of the Department of Agriculture.

Just a few more of these exhibits, because I think Senators will find this case sustained by the facts, and all I am asking is consideration of the facts.

Vegetable oils are of particular interest to American agriculture.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I regret that I was out of the Senate Chamber when the Senator from Michigan began his remarks. Had I known he was going to address the Senate on any phase of agriculture, I should have been happy to be present. I should like the Senator, for my benefit at least, to state what his point is—what he proposes—so that I may better understand the application of the facts to it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I hesitate to take the time of the Senate to repeat the formula which I announced at the beginning for the deliberate purpose of permitting the Senate to try to fit the facts into the thesis which I was submitting. In a word, the thesis is, first, that American agriculture is menaced today by inadequate tariffs, if the January and February trend of imports is a typical trend; second, that in the face of the facts it is fallacious to talk about a restoration of American agricultural prosperity by the recapture of an export market at the present time, because, upon the one hand, it is impossible to sell in export on a one-price system when that one price is our artificially stimulated domestic price; second, because of the self-containment in respect to agricultural and industrial commodities in other lands; third, because, in view of these circumstances and in view of the facts which I have submitted respecting specific exhibits resulting from the Belgian and Cuban reciprocity treaties, we are put upon notice to do the precise thing which Mr. George N. Peek, the special foreign trade adviser to the President, recommends in his official letter of the present week, namely, to survey the whole situation to determine whether we are on the right track.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will ask the Senator what agricultural commodities are coming in over the present tariff.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am busily engaged in presenting those figures.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, I will ask the Senator what political body established the present agricultural commodity tariff.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Alabama wishes to talk politics, as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] did a little while ago. I am trying to present an economic question. If there are any partisan conclusions to be drawn from it, any Senator is welcome to any conclusions he wishes to draw in respect thereto. I am concerned solely about the net result in terms of American trade, and I am undertaking to submit facts which have come officially to the Senate within the week, in response to a Senate resolution introduced by me, which I think put the Senate upon challenge to face these facts and determine whether or not we are on the right track.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Not for a political interjection.

Mr. LONG. Inasmuch as my friend from Michigan would not yield to my friend from Tennessee and Alabama to make these erroneous speeches, I shall not ask him to yield to me; but the facts are that the revenues of the farmer for 1934 were one-half of his revenues for 1929, and the dollar he got in 1929 was a 100-cent dollar—

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why does the Senator compare the revenues of 1929 with those of 1934? Why does he not make the comparison with 1931 and 1932—more recent years?

Mr. LONG. I shall be glad to do that also.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well; do that.

Mr. LONG. The facts are, however, if the Senator will permit me to finish my sentence, that the revenues of the farmer for 1929 were just twice as much as they were for 1934, and in 1929 he got a 100-cent dollar, while in 1934 he got a 59-cent dollar. The facts are, further, that the farmer could buy less with what he made in 1933—I do not know about 1934; they promised to get up the figures and send them to me, but they never did get them up, and I have not seen them since—in 1933 the farmer could buy less with what he got than at any other time in the history of the United States.

Those are the facts. All this talk about improving the condition of the farmer is just balderdash. Why, you have even got it down to where you will not let the poor devil farm to raise something that he is begging people to give him to wear. You will not let him raise it, and he cannot get money to buy it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Louisiana if he did not advocate all over the South not raising a stalk of cotton for a whole year?

Mr. LONG. I advocated the Lord's law; the sabbatical law of the Bible.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It does not make any difference whose law it is; I want to know if the Senator did not advocate that policy.

Mr. LONG. No, sir; on the contrary, when Hoover proposed plowing up every fourth row of cotton, I opposed it.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator from Louisiana wanted to plow it all up.

Mr. LONG. No; I did not do any such thing.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator had a law passed to that effect.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator had a law passed in Louisiana to prohibit the cotton farmers from raising a stalk of cotton for a whole year when he was dictating the laws of Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. No, sir.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I wish to get away from either the sabbatical law or the Bankhead law for a little while and go ahead with this discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield further.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am discussing the increasing flow of imports of agricultural commodities over the tariff wall, and I think it is too serious a matter to be detoured. I know my friend the Senator from Alabama will have precisely the same interest in these figures that I have, the interest being solely that of determining what is the state of the Union in respect to agriculture, and whether we are proceeding safely under the existing formula.

To continue the figures—

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. I am going to read his speech. I regret that I have not heard enough of it to follow it as I should like to do, because I respect the Senator's views.

I should like to ask the Senator if he does not believe in the effectiveness of the law of supply and demand as applied to agriculture, the same as applied to the automobile industry in his own State.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; but I fail to understand how the law of supply and demand is being permitted to operate today.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator doubtless knows, if he knows anything about the cotton situation, that we shall have on August 1 a carry-over supply of 9,000,000 bales of cotton against an annual consumption of about 12,000,000 bales.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; but the Senator was discussing the law of supply and demand, which has been entirely abandoned and eliminated under the process of artificial control which we are pursuing in respect to most of our major agricultural staples. I am not proposing to discuss that subject.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well—

Mr. VANDENBERG. Just a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield further.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Just a moment. Whatever the domestic formula is or ought to be, I submit that the Senator from Alabama will agree with me that in respect to protecting agricultural commodities no home-made formula can work unless we protect the domestic buying market against foreign imports.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That depends upon whether the market is better for domestic consumption or foreign consumption. Take the case of cotton: We are dependent upon foreign markets for the sale of 60 percent of our cotton. When the Senator discusses the agricultural problem I think he certainly ought to distinguish commodities which are absolutely dependent upon foreign markets from those which may be protected by the tariff, because all the production may be used in this country.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think that is entirely true, and I should want to make that discrimination and that distinction, and I shall try to do so; but let me continue this demonstration of the flow of imports.

I know of nothing in which agriculture is more interested than vegetable oils. That seems to be a rather universal interest. Coconut-oil cake was imported into the United States during the first 2 months of this year at the rate of 134,000,000 pounds per annum, compared with 21,000,000 pounds in all 12 months of 1933.

Soybean-oil cake was imported into the United States during the first 2 months of the present calendar year at the rate of 136,000,000 pounds per annum, compared to 60,000,000 pounds in 1934.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, has the Senator included in those figures any imports of oils from the Philippines and Hawaii?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am unable to answer the Senator's question—not Hawaii. The Philippines may be included, but I think not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Philippines have largely increased their exportations to this country, and, of course, they come in under another plan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. They do; but in contemplating our long-range picture we contemplate the Philippine Islands in a different status in the near future.

Cottonseed-oil cake, which I anticipate is of keen interest in the South—if I am not mistaken, it is of vital concern as a byproduct of the cotton operation—I call the attention of Senators to the fact that cottonseed-oil cake came into the United States, imported from abroad, during the first 2 months of this year, at the rate of 312,000,000 pounds per annum, compared with 7,000,000 pounds in 1933.

There is no use in going into the sugar figures, because those are perfectly obvious, and I have already spoken of them.

The senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] asked me for export figures. During the same comparable period which I am discussing, January and February, we exported just 756 cattle in numbers, $39,000 in value, compared to 15,655 cattle during the preceding calendar year, valued at $441,000.

Canned-meat exports are down, but not spectacularly down.

Our exports of butter, without burdening the Senate with detailed figures, are at a rate just about one-half of last year's exports.

Our exports of tallow were 24,000 pounds for the 2 typical months we are discussing, compared with 7,347,000 pounds of tallow exported during the 12 months of the year preceding.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator's view as to what caused this reduction in exports.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will be very glad to give the Senator my view when I have completed the list.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he goes on with the list?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I understood that the figures as to imports were for 2 months. Are the figures for the exports for the same 2 months?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The same 2 months.

Mr. BLACK. The figures the Senator is giving for last year are for the entire year?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct. During the first 2 months of this year we exported 55,000 bushels of corn, or at an annual rate of 330,000 bushels, compared with an export last year of nearly 3,000,000 bushels.

Of cottonseed-oil cake going now to the exhibit we last were discussing in respect to the imports—we exported during the first 2 months of this year just 3 tons of cottonseed-oil cake, compared with 16,979 tons during the 12 months of the preceding year.

The junior Senator from Alabama asked me what I thought was the reason for the decline in exports.

Mr. BLACK. Before the Senator reaches that point, may I ask him just one more question?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator's figures have been as to farm products?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. There has recently been some discussion about the desirability of trying to increase the export of farm products. Has the Senator the figures as to comparative exports of industrial products during the same period?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; I have not.

Mr. BLACK. I think it would be interesting to add them to the figures the Senator is giving.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think those figures would be interesting. I was discussing solely the agricultural problem in this contemplation, the only thing about which the Senate resolution asked information from the departments, and it is the departmental report to the Senate I am now laying before the Senate.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator, in that connection, if he has investigated this question? It is my recollection that the exports of industrial products have increased. Is that correct?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think that is true as to a few highly energized commodities, if I may use that phrase, commodities like motor cars. I do not think it is true in respect to the general run of industrial commodities; but I should prefer not to testify, because I have not looked that matter up.

Mr. President, one of the Senators has asked me what I think has happened. The first thing that has happened, in my opinion, is that much of the former export market, which we enjoyed in previous years, no longer exists. It no longer exists because in the post-war period the whole world—and I suspect every country in it—sought to put itself upon the basis of self-containment. This was the period during which all of these tariff walls arose higher than ever before, not only in the United States, but in practically every other country on the globe. This is the period during which the United States exported her capital and exported her methods of industrial mass production, and established herself in branch plants all around the world.

It was a period, in other words, when, under stress of necessity upon the one hand, these other countries were striving to produce for themselves the things which they formerly got from us, and upon the other hand the period when we ourselves were teaching them how to be self-contained, by our exports of machinery, our exports of mass-production methods, our exports of production brains, as it were, and our exports of producing capital.

Let me give the Senate just a few typical examples to indicate what I mean. Let us again revert to the Cuban example.

In 1928—and I think these figures are utterly significant, indeed, they are so spectacular that they are almost unbelievable—in 1928 Cuba bought from the United States 6,102,000 dozen eggs. In 1933 Cuba bought from the United States 26 dozen eggs.

In 1928 Cuba bought from the United States 413,000 pounds of butter. In 1933 Cuba bought from the United States 1,274 pounds of butter.

In 1928 Cuba bought 48,104 hogs from us. In 1933 Cuba bought 32 hogs from us.

In 1928 Cuba bought 11,267,475 pounds of condensed milk and cream from us. In 1933 Cuba bought 296,000 pounds of condensed milk and cream from us.

What had happened? I have a very illuminating letter from the Assistant Secretary of State himself. This is what happened. The Cuban Government and the Cuban people found themselves under precisely the same impulse under which the American people and the American Government found themselves, namely, in the stress of post-war calamity and depression, there was the necessity to strive for a self-containment.

Cuba put her tariff walls up, I think, in 1927. Cuba inspired her department of agriculture and the like to stimulate domestic production, precisely as we undertook to do the same thing, and precisely as every other country on the globe undertook to do it, and precisely as almost every country has pretty well succeeded in doing it. Does anybody believe that we can ever sell those 1928 ratios of commodities to Cuba again, regardless of tariff treaties, regardless of so-called "tariff bargains", and regardless of any aspiration we may have to develop our foreign trade?

Let us carry the same exhibit into a few industrials which I happen to have available upon this score. In 1928 Cuba bought from us 699,000 dozen pairs of cotton hose. In 1933 Cuba bought from us 4,834 dozen pairs of cotton hose.

In 1928 Cuba bought 39,563 dozen pieces of cotton underwear from us. In 1933 Cuba bought from us 527 dozen.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Between what years were these comparisons drawn?

Mr. VANDENBERG. 1928 and 1933, inclusive, a 6-year spread.

Mr. BORAH. It could not be possible that Cuba in that time had built up her manufacturing establishments so as to take care of her consumption?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No. I think a break-down of the record will show that she has partially built herself up internally, and she diverts her foreign purchases elsewhere in respect to some of the other fabricated products.

Mr. BORAH. I quite agree with the Senator in the view expressed that these exports are falling off by reason of the fact that the different nations are themselves seeking to produce. But underlying all these treaties, the fundamental thing, to which I presume the Senator will come, is the fact that the purchasing power of the different nations is constantly falling.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course, the Senator is entirely correct. Their purchasing power is falling, and meanwhile, reverting to the imports, they find themselves attracted to our markets by our artificially stimulated prices, which are attractive to them even over our tariff wall, and as a result they have us going and coming. That is why I have been urging consideration of the two-price system for American agriculture.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator uses the years 1928 and 1929, which we all know were unusual in this and every other country, so far as trade was concerned. Would it not be of greater importance, in showing how we are going now, to have the comparison made between the year 1932 or the year 1933 and the present time? It seems to me that singling out the 2 years which were most remarkable, in the matter of prices, in all our history, perhaps, and undertaking to compare prices in those years with prices at the present time, will not get us very far. What we want to know is whether we are advancing, whether we are going forward, or whether we are going backward, and it seems to me a better comparison would be between the year 1932 or the year 1933, and the year 1934 or 1935.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I am using the statistics of the last available calendar years which are open to me. In other words, I am bringing the contemplation as near down to date as the official figures which I have been able to procure permit.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are not the figures of 1930, 1931, and 1932 available?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; and I have all the figures for 1930, 1931, and 1932, and I shall be glad to give those to the Senator or put them in the Record.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator puts those figures in the Record.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me give the Senator one typical exhibit to answer his question. I revert to the exhibit of cotton hosiery. Cuba bought 699,000 dozen pairs, as I stated, in 1928. In 1929 that figure had fallen substantially, to 506,000 dozen pairs. In 1931 it had fallen to 241,995 dozen pairs. The Senator will note a constantly decreasing purchase. In 1931 it had fallen to 74,711 dozen pairs; in 1932 to 28,853 dozen pairs, and then we reach the 1933 figure of 4,834 dozen pairs.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I gather from the Senator's statement that he attributes, in large measure, the reduction in the exports of our agricultural commodities to what he calls an artificially high price.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator has frequently referred to the artificially high price.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; I think it is a factor. Pardon me, the Senator said I largely attributed it to that. I largely attribute it to the self-containment of the balance of the world, and, incidentally, to the factor the Senator from Alabama now discusses.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the Senator from Michigan puts emphasis upon the artificially high price of agricultural commodities. I should like to ask him if he really thinks there should be and if he advocates a reduction in the present price of wheat, oats, butter, eggs, hogs, and the other articles to which he has referred as having been reduced in export? Does the Senator, in order to retain the foreign market, object to the present price, whether artificial or not artificial?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I regret that the Senator has not heard me through. I most certainly do not advocate a reduction of the domestic prices. On the contrary I assert that it is perfect folly to attempt to build up a foreign trade at the expense of this domestic market if we have adequate domestic prices, and in my view the only chance we have is to depend primarily upon our domestic markets.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then—

Mr. VANDENBERG. Just a moment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then the only—

Mr. VANDENBERG. Just a moment. I have the floor and I insist upon answering the Senator's question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well, sir; I will wait 2 moments.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator will wait 2 moments—perhaps 3.

We are dependent physically upon our self-containment, primarily. Therefore, so far as I am concerned I would cease the effort to stimulate foreign trade at the expense of domestic trade. I would concentrate upon efforts to stimulate domestic trade. I do not believe it can be done in agriculture on the one-price system. I think it must be done on the two-price system. Under the two-price system, which may be some paraphrase of the old McNary-Haugen philosophy or something of the sort, I think it is best to create at home the situation which the Senator and I would both like to create, which must be a cost-of-production basis so far as agriculture is concerned, and then take whatever foreign markets as a by-product may be available to us.

I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in view of the surprising irritation and impatience of the Senator from Michigan, which I never before saw him evince, I do not care to interrupt him any further or to listen to him any further.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I regret to lose the presence of the able Senator from Alabama, but if it is lunch time, he is welcome to depart; and, so far as irritation is concerned, he must not criticize me for declining to allow him in my time to split my sentences in the middle. I have great respect for him, and I would not intentionally offend him.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield? I certainly do not want to irritate the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senators do not irritate me. I more than welcome their interruptions.

Mr. HATCH. I have been quite interested in the Senator's remarks, and especially the last statement he made about the two-price system. I was wondering if the Senator was speaking about the antidumping laws. What does the Senator have to say about that subject?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think the antidumping laws are the great barrier, and always were, to the two-price system. But if we can have barter bargains, bilateral bargains with foreign countries in respect to foreign trade—and that I understand is the program advocated by Mr. Peek—instead of multilateral-tariff bargains applicable to every country alike, I think it is possible to overcome the antidumping laws by direct barter bargains with given countries.

For example, let me suggest to the Senator that it seems to me a bargain between Brazil and the United States, for example, to be of real fundamental advantage to the United States should have been a bargain which, in return for our purchases of Brazil coffee, bound Brazil upon the one hand to stop the expansion of her own cotton planting under which she will soon become self-contained, and to grant to our cotton agriculture a quota portion of her purchases. That is my idea of a bargain which amounts to something, and I think that type of barter bargain is possible in spite of antidumping laws—indeed, the antidumping laws will scarcely apply.

Mr. President, I was indicating the various exhibits which demonstrate the loss; and I think the irrevocable loss of our foreign markets and the futility of building a trade policy upon the empty notion that somehow or other we can fish ourselves back in the oceans of the earth to a domestic prosperity.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, how is it that Japan is flooding this country with toothbrushes, chinaware, and other products which we used to sell of American manufacture? Has the Senator covered that point?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President; but, of course, they are flooding us with those goods because our tariffs are inadequate, among other reasons.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator's line of argument, but I was very much interested in his explanation of why we were losing our export trade.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I only touched one factor.

Mr. BORAH. I notice the Senator has only touched one factor. I hope before he concludes he will touch the other factor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall. Before I leave the inquiry made by the Senator from Louisiana, in which he asked about Japanese toothbrushes, and so forth, I call his attention to the fact that the Consumer's Guide, published by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration at the expense of the Government of the United States, in its issue for March 25, has a lead article applauding the importation of all these Japanese commodities, and indicating that that is a wonderful thing for the United States, by some sort of distorted logic or other.

Talk about propaganda at the expense of the American people against the best fundamental welfare of the American people!

We were speaking about a loss of these foreign markets, and I was arguing that we ought not to try to make water run up hill by subordinating our entire tariff policy at home to an effort to recapture a foreign trade which does not exist in any such degree as heretofore.

I call attention to the fact that only last week Mr. Oscar Johnston, manager of the A. A. A. cotton pool, on his return from an economic survey abroad, said:

I found in each of the countries visited a growing tendency toward restriction of imports and a tendency toward a strict nationalistic policy resulting from economic reasons and from the necessity of balancing of national budgets.

And here, significantly, is another typical exhibit:

I found an increased use of artificial textiles, particularly in Italy, where the production of artificial silk and cotton is being encouraged to give employment to native labor.

I might add that he could have reported that the spinners of Lancashire, who once were perhaps the greatest single group purchasers of American cotton—that the spinners of Lancashire, England, had a great celebration about 6 weeks ago to mark the day when they completed 12 whole months without the purchase of a single pound of American cotton. If Senators want to know what I think is happening to our export market, there are the indisputable facts in at least one aspect.

Mr. President, I desire to digress from the line of my remarks long enough to apologize to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] for what is going on here. He has a motion pending to take up a bill in which he is interested, and I told him I was not going to be on the floor more than an hour. I know the Senator did not take it too seriously, but I want to apologize to him and tell him that I would have been through long ago except that my time has been occupied by others infinitely more than by myself, and I am hastening to a conclusion.

Mr. President, as to why our foreign market is gone, I wish to bring to the Senate's attention one more very pertinent exhibit.

In 1932 there were 711 American companies with 1,819 factory branches outside the United States, employing 450,455 men outside the United States, representing an investment of $2,177,000,000. If there is one reason more than another why we cannot hope to regain the export trade which we once had in the old days, let it be said that in contrast to the above figures in 1898 there was only 1 company with 1 little plant abroad. How can we hope to regain the great export trade which we previously served from our home base but which we now serve from 1,819 factory units which are foreign branches of American factories, employing abroad 450,000 men and representing $2,000,000,000 of investment? It is perfectly obvious that there goes another great feeder for our export trade.

Mr. President, here is another and final exhibit from the Government's own records which bears conclusively upon the vast change which has come upon world trade and America's participation in it, the proof of another gigantic dislocation chargeable primarily to the World War. We have available the international balance sheet of the United States with the world, issued by Hon. George N. Peek, special adviser to the President on foreign trade, as of August 30, 1934. It is supplemented by the authentic records of the Department of Commerce. This Peek report has had entirely too little attention and publicity. It has had entirely too little influence upon the thinking of the President, of Congress, and of the country. It is the story, in plain arithmetic, of 38 years of our national life in foreign trade. The report is broken down into four important periods; and if Senators will follow me through these four periods they will gather the import of this challenge.

The first period is from 1896 to July 1, 1914; the great normal pre-war period of 18½ years when our exports averaged $1,720,000,000 as compared with the imports of $1,204,000,000, an export excess of $424,000,000.

The second period, from July 1, 1914, to 1922, is the war period of 8½ years, when our exports leaped to an average of $5,522,000,000, as compared with imports of $3,031,000,000, an exports excess of $2,492,000,000.

The third period, from 1922 to 1929, inclusive, was the post-war period of 7 years, the period of stupendous losses by American citizens to the citizens of the world, the period when our exports averaged $4,816,000,000, as compared with our imports of $4,105,000,000, an export excess of $711,000,000.

Finally the fourth period from 1930 to 1933, inclusive, was the maladjustment period in the United States, when our exports were $2,388,000,000, compared with imports of $1,981,000,000, an export excess of $408,000,000.

Let it be noted that our big export trade is in the second period when it is induced by war, and in the third period when it is induced by loans, and that it is induced in both periods by the feverish anxiety of the other nations of the world to build themselves to a basis of self-containment.

I take it that we are not interested in investing in another war or in renewing prodigal European credits for the purpose of fertilizing our foreign trade. I take it no one will deny that we cannot duplicate the exports which have contributed to foreign self-containment, nor the exports which are displaced abroad by the fruits of this self-containment.

In the presence of such circumstances, it seems to me that the pretense and philosophy of relying upon foreign trade primarily for American recuperation become notoriously transparent, and reliance upon these broken reeds becomes a snare and a delusion.

One other point I emphasize in connection with this international balance sheet as bearing pertinently upon the problem. It is always urged that Europe cannot buy our goods unless we buy Europe's goods, and, in the long sweep, that is true; but I point out that Europe seems to find a way to buy from us what she wants to buy, regardless of this direct reciprocity. This is what I mean:

Foreigners bought four and a half billion dollars of our American stocks and bonds from 1923 to 1929, and one and a quarter billion dollars even in the distressed fourth period above outlined; yea, foreigners apparently bought $970,000,000 of our securities in the year ending December 31, 1934. They have money for what they want from us; we are not going to be able to sell them what they do not want.

With the assistance of experts, I have prepared a brief summary of these four periods of the balance sheet of America's international trade, and, in order to save time, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the summary will be printed in the RECORD.

The summary is as follows:

This brief now undertakes to analyze the history of our foreign trade as seen from these reports of Mr. Peek and the Department of Commerce. We note that our foreign trade for the 18½ years prior to 1914 showed the following merchandise imports and exports:

The eighteen and a half years of international trade between the United States and the world, in the years 1896 to July 1, 1914, reveals the relatively satisfactory state of commercial civilization, attained by the world in friendly course of trade, in the peaceful years at the turn of the century.

At the end of 1914 Great Britain had enjoyed 125 years of almost uninterrupted leadership in the markets of the world; Germany and France had had 40 years of peaceful expansion; and the other European countries about the same, while the United States had carried on the development of her foreign trade some 60 years. More than 50 percent of the national turn-over of Great Britain's business was in foreign trade. The corresponding percentage for Germany was 35 and the United States 7. Yet, almost one-half of our 7 percent was most vital, because it was in agricultural products. The great foreign trade of the world consisted largely of moving foodstuffs and raw materials from the scattered peoples of the world to the concentrated populations of Europe, while from those European countries enjoying a higher degree of welfare and living there was sent out their excess of manufactured products to the raw material and foodstuff producers, scattered and living in the European colonial possession and other nations. A policy of unrestricted exchange of goods between the nations of the world largely existed for years, except in the case of France, Germany, and our own country. These latter maintained a tariff policy to protect their manufactured goods. The European countries largely produced the department store type of goods for the scattered peoples of the world while the United States largely limited its manufactured exports to surpluses created by its great producing industries, such as motors, tires, sewing machines, cash registers, farm implements, refined oil products, and the like.

During and at the end of that period we were a debtor nation, borrowing from Europe, which was largely our customer for our exportable surpluses of especially farm, factory, and mine.

In our foreign trade we were practically on an even keel and a barter basis. The year 1914 was to end a great normal period of international trade which was shortly to be destroyed by war and never reestablished. New world conditions were on the verge of formation, following a catastrophic destruction, which was to throw all the nations of the world on to a new basis of national containment. One of its results was to force Great Britain from her historic condition of free trade to a policy of self-containment and high tariff, with bartering as a basis for her future foreign trade.

The second period from July 1, 1914, to December 31, 1922, a period of eight and a half years, was to give us merchandise exports and imports as follows:

Year	Merchandise		Net excess of United States exports	Deficit of imports
	Exports	Imports

It is a war-time trade sheet with the world. Shortly after the commencement of the war, by submarine and war-time necessities, a steel curtain was drawn about the export trade of the great European nations and held there for 6 years. The scattered populations of the world were forced to build factories within their own confines to take care of the goods formerly furnished by Europe, while we furnished the scattered populations with the machinery to equip those factories.

South America, Japan, and India began buying in the United States the machinery to build for themselves a great portion of the manufactured goods that had formerly been imported into those countries in order to supply their own domestic markets. South America principally interested herself in machinery to provide factories for packing, clothing, hardware, jewelry, farm implements, household furniture, and the like, while Japan and India proceeded to capture the textile needs of eastern Asia, and England lost the bunkering of coal for the boats of the world through the use of oil, thus destroying full round-trip cargoes and cheap carrying rates for her imports. This new move, starting in 1917, proceeded at an increasing rate to 1935. The scattered populations of the world, of the period prior to 1914, proceeded to take care largely of their own manufactured needs. They have gone onto a self-contained national basis and have forced great world merchandising countries to move on their present-day self-contained basis, protected by tariffs, quotas, and special treaties, in order that they might exist. At the same time forcing our great European customers for wheat to increase wheat acreage on the European continent to take care of Europe on a basis of self-containment to the utter destruction of our wheat surplus.

The third period from 1923 to 1929 shows our international trade as a post-war peace-time balance sheet. The merchandise records are as follows:

Year	Merchandise		Net excess of United States exports	Deficit of imports
	Exports	Imports
				Percent
1923.....	4,167	3,792	375
1924.....	4,591	3,610	981

1929.....	5,241	4,400	841

This 7 years' post-war period was one where the nations of Europe particularly endeavored to reconstruct themselves after a devastating loss. Great urgent necessity, propagandized to United States investors, to provide new capital for the rebuilding of European countries, as well as those of Canada and South America. Great orders for building material and machinery flowed into the United States, and we loaned the world during this period $7,000,000,000 on long time. The world used but $2,500,000,000 to take care of its balance with the United States, and invested in the United States during this period $4,500,000,000, most of which was invested in short-time securities of this country or deposited in our banks, which greatly contributed to the wild speculation from 1927 to 1929 and caused the great financial debacle in 1929, when they withdrew billions of these deposits. In this period is the international balance sheet for the year 1929, which the State Department and the Department of Agriculture are endeavoring to again regain; it shows $5,240,000,000 of exports, $4,400,000,000 of imports, with a net excess of United States exports of $841,000,000. How can it be done in the face of the facts?

We furnished, from 1919 to 1929 the European countries with the money and machinery to go onto a self-contained basis, while from 1914 to 1929 we had furnished South America and Japan and India the money and machinery for those countries to go onto a self-contained basis. The 1929 financial world debacle was the culmination of war effects and of loose international financial policy on the part of the United States, wherein, after the war, it had exported to the world its money, its machinery, its management, and its patents, to establish a new economic basis of nationalism for the countries of the world, a fact that the present administration does not seem to realize.

At the close of the year 1929 the European farmers are in full possession of their peace-time farm acreage and have greatly increased that acreage, to the all-time destruction of the world sale of United States wheat surpluses. Too, the United States has become the great creditor nation of the world, and has exported its excess liquid capital and placed it in unprofitable and bad loans.

International trade balance sheet between the United States and the world from 1930 to 1933—merchandise exports and imports placed it back in a category similar to the 1896-1914 period.

Year	Merchandise		Net excess of United States exports	Deficit of imports

1931	2,424	2,909	334

Average, 4 years	2,388	1,981	408	17

During this period Great Britain, after some 75 years, has been forced from her historic position of free trade and gone to a doctrine of self-containment, high tariff, and special-privilege treaties with the several units of her empire and with other countries of the world. Apparently we are about to take up, at least partially, the position abandoned by Great Britain and make it our economic position in the face of the new world economic alignment.

Repeatedly do we hear that the world is unable to buy from us because they cannot create the funds in the United States to pay for goods purchased here. Strange that they should use $4,500,000,000 to buy our securities from the funds we loaned to them in the 7 years prior to 1929; and strange, too, that again during this 4-year period from 1930 to 1934 the world again invested in this country of our securities $1,312,000,000. Secretaries Hull and Wallace in March on the radio advised the country of the dangerous condition of our foreign trade, due to the fact that the world was not able during the year 1934 to create balances in the United States with which to pay for more goods, pointing out the great importation of gold on the part of the world to the United States during that year as evidence of the grave necessity of the world customers to the United States to meet their obligations in the United States, and intimating that the gold came here to meet merchandise balances. As I understand it, the position of the administration is that our world customers for agricultural goods are in such a distressful financial condition that they cannot buy our wheat, our cotton, our tobacco, our meat products, and that only by allowing the world to ship more manufactured and farm goods into this country, under low-tariff rates, will they be able to create those balances in the United States with which to buy our wheat, cotton, tobacco, and meats. I point out that again it is strange that Europe principally purchased $970,000,000 of our securities in the year 1934—long-time securities we sold on the old gold basis. Securities which on the stock market were way below the original sales price, due to the failure of foreign countries to meet their interest were purchased with a 60-cent dollar. It is estimated that $3,000,000,000 of face-value securities were taken out of this country for the $970,000,000 of gold brought here. Thus it is conclusively shown that our foreign customers had at hand almost $1,000,000,000 to buy our cotton, tobacco, wheat, and lard if European countries desired to buy our products.

Under the tariff laws some 200 special treaties are now in existence between foreign countries, and under their doctrine of self-containment and national planning these foreign countries do not desire and will not buy certain types of our goods.

The record of the purchase of $4,500,000,000 of our securities on the part of foreigners in the period from 1923 to 1929, and of $1,300,000,000 in the fourth period, 1930 to 1933, and again the purchase of $970,000,000 in the year 1934 proves definitely and conclusively that the more we cut our tariff and thus the more competitive products of farm, factory, and mines that are allowed to enter the United States the more credit we furnish to the world to buy more securities in American markets at 60 cents on the dollar. The world had strong power to buy in the United States in the year 1934, and it used its excess power to buy what it wanted and that was low-priced securities, both foreign and American, at 60 cents on the dollar.

It is now proposed that we jeopardize the great American market for American labor in factory, farm, and mine, and office so that the world can have a good slice of it and with their cheap goods drive down the hourly rate for labor to every employee in the United States, thereby creating a lower standard of living and greater distress. Strange national merchandising; billions of dollars spent by this Government to prime the pump of recovery in order that a high standard of living and welfare be maintained in the United States; and, too, as a handmaid and aid to sustain the welfare of the laborer of America we have the scheme of the N. R. A. and the large processing taxes for our farmer. Every national effort spent to decrease our unemployment and to uphold and increase the national welfare of our people. Yet another policy has definitely been fastened on to our national economic system that threatens to knock the very bottom out of the barrel and rapidly undo all the work that has been done in the last 2 years.

With tariff powers and embargo powers in the hands of the President we are witnessing an imported assault on the price structure of the labor of farm, factory, mine, and office.

Let any fair-minded American citizen look over the merchandise exports and imports of the United States for the 18½ years prior to 1914 and find in it, if he can, that the world ever possessed or had any large interest in marketing their imports into the United States. They never possessed our market to any appreciable degree. The annual average merchandise exports for 18½ years was only $1,720,000,000, and the average annual imports for that period was only $1,204,000,000, with a net excess of United States exports of only $424,000,000. Compare this with the 4-year period of 1930 to 1933, where you find that the annual average of our merchandise exports was $2,388,000,000, and the average annual imports was $1,981,000,000, and the average net excess of United States exports was $408,000,000, while for the year 1934 our merchandise exports was $2,133,000,000 and our imports $1,655,000,000, with a net excess of exports of $458,000,000.

The present administration proposes to destroy that natural ratio between exports and imports which existed for many years prior to 1914, and which is in evidence again in the last 5 years. The world, through the war having lost its world markets, now are being offered by the administration, through the State Department, American markets that they never possessed to fill up the void caused by their lost world trade. It must be kept in mind that the President of the United States was granted full power to raise or lower the tariff rates within 50 percent of the established rate; and under the N. R. A. was granted full powers, even unto an embargo, against foreign goods. The President has not exercised his powers, either to protect the price structure or to maintain employment, or to protect the labor of factory, farm, mine, and office in the United States from a large movement of low-price goods into the United States. He has not raised the tariff barriers, nor has he placed an embargo on the entry into this country of these destructive and competitive goods. On the contrary, he negotiates trade treaties which actually reduce our protection.

What is the most recent official information regarding our contemporary trade?

On April 27, 1935, the Department of Commerce released a bulletin on United States Foreign Trade in March. An examination of this bulletin showed that the progressive rate of importation of competitive farm goods into the United States is continuing. The bulletin, among other things, says: "Total export of agricultural products declined, however, mainly as the result of the continued recession in shipments of unmanufactured cotton, although exports at large, fresh apples, and canned fruit were smaller in quantity in March than in the corresponding period of any year since 1924. Because of the higher level of prices, however, March 1935 value of unmanufactured cotton exports were larger than in the same months of 1933, when quantity shipments were 49 percent greater."

Again, "the expansion in value of import trade during March was due to larger purchase of a wide range of commodities. The value of agricultural commodities increased 11 percent, while non-agricultural products showed a gain of 22 percent. Among the agricultural commodities, the percentage increase in the imports of grain, meats, butter, edible vegetable oils, oil seeds, fruits, vegetables, tea, spices, and Cuban sugar were particularly large." * * *

Again quote: "Imports for consumption during the 3-month period ending with March 1935 showed an increase of $89,000,000, or 22 percent, in comparison with the same period of 1934. Approximately 30 percent of this expansion resulted from an increase in imports of farm products. Imports of farm products began to enter our markets in substantial quantities during the last half of 1934, and during 1935 they have become increasingly heavy."

Again: "Since the first of the year a total of 24,759,000 square yards of cotton cloth has arrived in the United States, of which 16,721,000 square yards, or 68 percent, were from Japan. During the first quarter total arrivals have represented between 1 and 1½ percent of the total domestic production of countable cotton cloth."

This onslaught on our farm market is similar to the one that is being made on the American markets of labor and industry. It is at once apparent that the prevailing American policies are beginning a new devastation of farm and factory in the United States. Is there anyone so foolish as to believe that a condition like this appearing in Canada, in Great Britain, in France, in Belgium, in Italy, or in Russia would not be checked overnight and a new economic policy installed which would take care of the national welfare?

Again, the preliminary figures for the month of March 1935 show our merchandising trade, by 3-month periods, is as follows:

Exports and imports	3 months ending March—		Increase (+) decrease (—)
	1935	1934
	1,000 dollars	1,000 dollars	1,000 dollars
Exports.....	524,214	525,839	-1,625
Imports.....	496,750	426,465	+70,285
Excess of exports.....	27,464	99,375

Again, in this same report we find that during the first 3 months of this year there was imported in this country gold and silver in excess of exports of $335,409,000. You will note that the excess of merchandise exports over imports for the first 3 months of this year is only $27,464,000, leaving but one deduction from the above figures, that the excess of gold and silver imports of $335,409,000 is again being used by foreign purchasers to buy our depreciated securities on a 60-cent dollar basis. This again indicates that the world is not short of funds with which to buy our farm surpluses, but that they do not want our surpluses of cotton, wheat, tobacco, and lard. They are interested in a good bargain, in securities, and are taking advantage of it. The world is not stinting itself on buying such world surpluses as it needs, but is buying those surpluses from other countries, under the doctrine of national containment through direct-barter treaties where these purchasing nations can benefit themselves. Strange that this administration should be beset with the idea that the world is hungry for our wheat, cotton, tobacco, and lard and is so poor that it cannot buy them from us. The fact stands out, as clear as the noonday sun, that all during the last 5 years, while the 200 barter treaties were being made by European countries, with their world customers, they were arranging under their national planning and containment to buy, insofar as possible, agricultural needs elsewhere, where they could make good barter trades.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have concluded. Perhaps I should add this bit of information, because it is significant and illuminating: It is frequently urged that there is no way by which foreign countries can buy our goods or settle with us for their obligations except by permitting them to sell us more goods. There is a point at which that argument becomes irrefutable, but I want to leave in the Record before I conclude the proof of the very great importance of some other factors which permit foreign contacts with the United States in a trade sense, regardless of whether or not we increase our purchases from them.

I am now discussing foreign credits other than those created by triangular trade. Referring to the international balance sheet which I have just analyzed for the Record, I point out that in the first period of the balance sheet, which is from 1896 to 1914—and this is the only normal period on the balance sheet—the United States had a credit against the remainder of the world totaling $727,000,000 for shipping and freight charges paid on imports carried in foreign vessels; a credit of $3,800,000,000 for interest and dividends paid on foreign private capital invested in the United States; a credit of $3,230,000,000 for American tourists' expenditures in foreign countries; a credit of $2,850,000,000 for immigrant remittances and charity paid to foreigners; and other incidental items, bringing the total, shall I say, by-product credit available to us abroad to $11,351,000,000. All this is available to pay for trade with us by foreign nations.

One thing more: Foreign trade is highly advantageous and much to be desired when it can be obtained at a profit to the sum total of our national economy. Let no man interpret me as saying that I would relax any rational efforts to get it. It is still obtainable in some highly energized American specialties. The American motor trade is an example.

Foreign trade is a great asset in times of peace. In times of war it is of vast and unlimited profit in artificial and unwholesome exports; but it is of equal hazard to our neutrality and to our ability to avoid and evade the war contagion itself. Thus, even when we have it, it is not an unmixed blessing. In the large view, it may become an unspeakable curse—precisely as it did in 1914-17. This is another thing to be seriously remembered at this particular moment in troubled world history.

It becomes in turn a peace-time curse, Mr. President, if its lure causes us to turn our faces from the homeland toward an alien mirage. A mirage is something pleasant which seems to be but is not.

Mr. President, in conclusion—and I have now finished—Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not hear the beginning of the Senator's address and he probably has covered the field; but may I ask him what conclusions he draws from his observations? Does he favor no foreign trade, or how much foreign trade does he favor, or does he favor increasing the tariff still more?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in 4 minutes I will have been speaking to the Senate 2 hours answering the exact question the Senator now submits, and, if he will forgive me, I will refer him to the Record.

Mr. TYDINGS. I shall not, of course, persist in my inquiry if the Senator has answered it, but I was hoping that he would say whether he favored still higher tariffs or whether he does not favor still higher tariffs.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Michigan does favor them.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then, he favors less trade with the world than we now have?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not going to answer the Senator's trick question.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think there is any trick about it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do, because I dissent from the premise. It is like asking a man, "Have you quit beating your wife? Answer 'yes' or 'no.'" It just cannot be done. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator contends that by putting up tariff barriers that will increase foreign trade, of course, his premise is well taken, but I always thought that the purpose of putting a tariff barrier around the country was to keep foreign commerce from coming in and thereby decreasing it. The suggestion has no more relationship to the story of the man beating his wife than has the answer of the Senator to my question.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I realize that I used a very unfortunate analogy in responding to the Senator, inasmuch as he has no wife and cannot therefore understand what it is I mean. [Laughter.]

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me say that no prudent person will undertake to be dogmatic in diagnosing the present ills of the body politic. Every honest view is entitled to fair assay, but no one is entitled to say with assurance, "This is the way." It is in this spirit that I have submitted to the Senate my analysis of the official reports which the Senate asked from the departments, and their application to other contemporary information and events.

My conclusion follows:

It is impracticable and hazardous doctrine to talk of recapturing American prosperity by primary reliance upon increased foreign trade, because, except in the case of highly energized specialties, the old trade does not and probably will not again exist.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there just in line with what he is saying?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. One of the highly energized specialties which we should keep on exporting are automobiles, of which we export about 10 percent; would the Senator be willing to lose the foreign trade of 10 percent in automobiles?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I discussed the automobile situation with great frankness before the Senator arrived, and I have indicated my complete disagreement with the automobile-production thinking on the subject of exports, although I have expressed my gratitude to the Secretary of State for taking such excellent care of them if he is going to make any more tariff bargains.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then, the Senator seems to concede in his last observation that, after all the promotion of world trade has helped the automobile industry, and he is willing to throw that great benefit overboard in order to carry out his general policy.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I apologize to the Senator from Nebraska again, but he will understand I cannot permit that observation of the Senator from Maryland to stand without comment.

It is my view that when the automobile industry increased its trade in Cuba under the so-called "bargain" by 450 percent, as the State Department stated, using a most eloquent figure, the percentage must lose some of its magnitude when reduced to actual sales. It is my contention that if and when the automobile industry increases its sales to Cuba to a total of 978 units at the expense of the domestic sugar-beet production in the United States primarily—because that is what happened—it will probably find it has lost far more than 978 sales in the 16 States where that industry has been curtailed.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator makes a very wise observation, and I can follow him on that. In effect, it simply means the Senator would transfer the sales of automobiles from the automobile people and supplant those sales with more sales to the sugar-beet people. That is what it boils down to, as I understand. He would take that trade from the automobile manufacturers of Detroit and other places and give it to the sugar-beet people. Is that correct?

Mr. VANDENBERG. My view is that any export trade which the automobile industry can obtain is very much worth while and should be encouraged so long as it is not at the expense of the domestic buying power, because 93 percent of the automobiles are sold in the United States and only 7 percent are sold abroad under any circumstances. I object to a policy which threatens any factor of the 93 percent while just fishing for some of the 7 percent. I do not believe it is good business, in the long run, for the automobile business itself.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate the Senator's viewpoint. I do not want to be insistent, but is it not a fact that what he really advocates is taking the export trade from the automobile manufacturers and transferring that amount of domestic trade to the sugar-beet producers?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Oh, no!

Mr. TYDINGS. I would not find fault with the Senator if he should adopt that policy. I am trying to find out if that is his policy.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; but I would have the sugar-beet farmers in this particular instance equipped with an income to buy automobiles instead of having the Cuban sugar producers so equipped.

Mr. TYDINGS. In other words, the Senator would take away the export market for automobiles with the idea that it would help the domestic market for automobiles.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No. I would not try to create an arbitrary export market with a so-called "tariff bargain" which does penalize the domestic market and the domestic chances for sale.

Mr. TYDINGS. According to the Senator's reasoning, why not take away all the export markets and keep all the money in this country and have no foreign trade, so we can get all the trade?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator may find himself approximately in that status whether he wants to be or not.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to be, but I am trying to ascertain because I know the Senator is a Presidential candidate and I may want to vote for him. Who can tell?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Maryland is the third gentleman who has risen on the other side of the aisle and tried to talk politics to me.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is a very candid man, as a rule, and I was hoping that, with his usual frankness, he would give me an answer to what I thought were pertinent questions, namely, whether he would be better satisfied if we had higher tariff barriers and had no foreign commerce, because if that were the case our people could buy more from our domestic producers than they can now buy as a result of our foreign trade. If I understood the Senator correctly, that is the essence of what he said.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator has put a construction upon it which is approximately correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is all I wanted to ascertain. I merely wanted to understand the Senator's position. He may be right about it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator has injected into the statement, however, a very shrewdly prejudicial method of submitting the inquiry, and I dissent from some of the implications involved.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Maryland a question?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Michigan has the floor. I should be glad to answer with his permission.

Mr. VANDENBERG. With further apologies to the Senator from Nebraska, I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. Upon the answer of the Senator from Michigan, is the Senator from Maryland willing to support him for the Presidency?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I cannot do so on that platform, but he may come out for some other things that would be even better than that issue.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is probably not the most serious question mark the Senator has in mind as he contemplates 1936.

Mr. President, I was reciting my conclusions and I am going to finish them without interruption. That involves no suggestion of any hostility because of the conversation I have just had with my very able friend from Maryland.

I start again on these conclusions because I had only related one of them and I should like to preserve their continuity.

First. It is impractical and hazardous doctrine to talk of recapturing American prosperity by primary reliance upon increased foreign trade, because except in a case of highly energized specialties, the old trade does not and probably will not exist.

Second. It is particularly menacing to seek these foreign penetrations at the expense of so-called "tariff bargains" on a multilateral "favored-nation" basis, which open up our domestic markets to new and deadly foreign competition at a moment when our industry and agriculture manifestly require more rather than less protection.

Third. The need for this increased protection is beginning to be clearly demonstrated by contemporary import figures which show a dangerously increasing trend for which we get no possible compensation, but from which we shall get a new deflationary crisis if the trend continues.

Fourth. It is impossible for us to revive agriculture on the legitimate cost-of-production basis, inevitably involving American prices that are higher than world prices on our surplus staples, if we continue to try to sell these surpluses at the domestic price. The world will not buy. The two-price system is the only recourse. No less a spokesman for American business than the retiring president of the United States Chamber of Commerce has recently proclaimed his conviction that a dual price level is the only possible answer for agriculture.

Fifth. Foreign trade is useful in whatever degree it may continue to be claimed as a byproduct. It is fatal as a major quest. The reliance of American agriculture and industry and labor must be the protected American domestic market which gave us 93 percent of our normal prosperity and which can do so again.

With which, Mr. President, I thank the Senate for its attention, and again present my apologies to the Senator from Nebraska for the delay in the consideration of his pending motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2357, proposing an amendment to the Tennessee Valley Authority Act.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Nebraska that I shall not detain the Senate for more than a moment. I am tremendously interested in proceeding with his bill, and shall not delay it.

Mr. President, I have listened with some degree of care to the speech just delivered by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. I was greatly interested in it. The burden of his troubles seems to be, as stated by himself, that agriculture is now menaced by an absence of high tariffs. It is also menaced, he claims, by an attempt to recapture our foreign markets for agriculture; and one of his questions was, "What is the state of the Union in respect to agriculture?"

In my judgment, the best way to have the last question answered is to ascertain what the facts are, what the prices of farm products have been within the past 2 years and 3 months.

I have before me, from the Department of Commerce, a table of prices of certain agricultural commodities in this country at various periods. I believe a perusal of these figures will absolutely answer every question which the Senator from Michigan has attempted to raise here today.

First I take corn. In January 1933 corn was worth 23 cents per bushel. In January 1934 it was worth 48 cents per bushel. In January 1935 it was worth 91 cents per bushel—an increase in the price of one of our great agricultural commodities from 23 cents per bushel to 91 cents per bushel! It seems to me all the questions which the Senator raised about corn are answered in those three figures.

Next I take wheat. In January 1933 the price of wheat was 43 cents per bushel. In January 1934 it was 84 cents per bushel. In January 1935 it was $1.008 per bushel.

Steers, good to choice, in Chicago: January 1933, $5.09 per hundred pounds; January 1934, $5.50 per hundred pounds; January 1935, $10.875 per hundred pounds.

Hogs, January 1933, $2.94 per hundred pounds; January 1934, $3.38 per hundred pounds; January 1935, $7.98 per hundred pounds—practically $8 a hundred.

Cotton, January 1933, 6 cents per pound; January 1934, 11 cents per pound; January 1935, 12.7 cents per pound.

Tobacco, January 1933, $10.41 per hundred pounds; January 1934, $14.08 per hundred pounds; January 1935, $21.56 per hundred pounds.

Wool, January 1933, 20 cents per pound; January 1934, 42.5 cents per pound; January 1935, 27.4 cents per pound—the only instance of a fall in price of any of these commodities.

Butter, as to which the Senator from Michigan complained that the price was going down: In January 1933 the price of butter was 18 cents per pound; in January 1934, 18 cents per pound; in January 1935, at the time when these imports were coming in, 30 cents per pound.

Cheese, whole milk, Wisconsin dairies, January 1933, 12 cents per pound; January 1934, 12 cents per pound; January 1935, 16 cents per pound.

Wheat flour, standard patents, January 1933, $3.79 per barrel; January 1934, $6.83 per barrel; January 1935, $7.31 per barrel.

Beef, fresh, January 1933, 10 cents per pound; January 1934, 8 cents per pound; January 1935, 15 cents per pound.

Hams, January 1933, 10.7 cents per pound; January 1934, 11.8 cents per pound; January 1935, 16.5 cents per pound.

Mr. President, these are the principal agricultural products of America. Without a single exception they have all advanced in price. In every case these agricultural products have constantly advanced from 1933 to 1935; and yet the Senator from Michigan is undertaking to find fault with these tremendous advances in all agricultural products, claiming that trade agreements are a menace to the farmers, and present-day policies are hurtful to farmers. I say to him that the farmers of this country who are raising these products will not agree with him in criticising what is being done by the Government in this connection. The policies of the A. A. A. and foreign-trade agreements are all helping to put the farmers in better condition than they have been for years.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD a detailed statement, given me by the Department of Commerce, showing these various prices at various dates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. One other matter, Mr. President: I have before me a table of the principal nonagricultural products, also furnished by the Department of Commerce, showing in like manner a constant increase in prices since January 1933, up to March 1935. I ask unanimous consent that this table may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me say that in my judgment these figures constitute a complete answer to every contention made by the Senator from Michigan. We have tried time and again since I have been in the Senate these shopworn and fruitless policies of higher tariffs on agricultural products. They do not protect. They do not increase prices. Such tariffs have failed the farmer time and again. The new-deal policies have not failed the farmers. They have increased prices. In like manner these trade agreements are giving us additional markets abroad, and thereby enhancing prices. They are aiding the farmers, and I believe the farmers know it.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield the floor.

Mr. AUSTIN obtained the floor.

Mr. FRAZIER. I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to answer it.

Mr. FRAZIER. I do not think the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] complained at all about the increase in prices of farm products.

Mr. McKELLAR. He asked, "What is the state of the Union in respect to agriculture?" and, of course, we all know that the principal question in agriculture is what the farmer is going to get for his products.

Mr. FRAZIER. The objection he raised was to the imports that are coming in.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but suppose imports are coming in: We have the indisputable fact that while imports may temporarily be coming in, to a greater degree the prices of farm commodities are constantly going up. Therefore, the American farmer, instead of being injured, is being greatly benefited.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President—

Mr. FRAZIER. Prices have gone up, generally speaking, since 1932 and 1933; but I desire to give some figures from the Agricultural Department for the week ending May 4:

Bonded stocks of other grains in United States, current week: From Argentina, wheat, 855,000 bushels; corn, 678,000 bushels; oats, 1,411,000 bushels; rye, 110,000 bushels.

Then from Poland there were imported 116,000 bushels of oats and 1,115,000 bushels of rye. The importation of rye is well over a million bushels for that week.

I have here a statement from a man connected with the milling trade in New York commenting on these imports.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will wait just a moment, he has referred to a week's importation. That might have been brought about by the fact that there has been a very great increase, so I am told—I cannot speak from experience—in the demand for rye, because of the fact that the prohibition amendment has recently been repealed. I do not know whether or not that is true. It may be. I do not think the Senator's figures are important, however, because they refer to too short a term. One week's figures about imports do not tell the story. Besides, I am informed that rye has increased enormously in price, to the great advantage of the rye farmers.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this man from New York, in the milling business, makes this statement in a telegram:

Note how rye is pouring in from abroad. Note that stocks of rye in the visible are 8,564,000 bushels. The estimated rye crop is 40,000,000 bushels, versus 16,000,000 last year.

That is the estimated crop for the coming season—40,000,000 bushels as against 16,000,000 bushels last year.

This man goes on and makes this statement:

I hear the distilleries are selling their corn and buying rye, due to its cheapness.

The price of rye has not gone up anywhere in comparison with the increase in the price of corn.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that I do not know as to that; but I desire to ask the Senator a question. Is he in favor of doing away with present administration system of increasing prices for the farmers, or is he in favor of returning to the system of increasing the tariff?

Mr. FRAZIER. I wish to say to the Senator from Tennessee that, of course, I am not in favor of reducing the amount of farm products that can be raised by our own people and letting them be imported from other countries.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator recalls perfectly well that until 1932 we undertook to raise the prices of farm products by increasing the tariff rates. I say "we." I did not join in that enterprise—I voted against it—and I do not know whether the Senator did or not; but the Congress undertook to do that. The Senator recalls that.

Mr. FRAZIER. I remember that.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the Senator knows that it did not have that effect, does he not? The Senator does not wish to go back to that high-tariff system, does he?

Mr. FRAZIER. I never thought the farmer got a square deal in that tariff legislation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Whether or not the farmer got a square deal, agricultural prices did not go up, did they?

Mr. FRAZIER. No; they did not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under the present arrangement, agricultural prices have gone up constantly, have they not?

Mr. FRAZIER. Well, of course, a number of things figure in that matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know; but surely the Senator from North Dakota, as strong a friend of the farmer as he is constantly saying he is—and I know he is—is not in favor of turning down a system which has raised the prices of farm products to the farmer, is he?

Mr. FRAZIER. Oh, I want to see the prices stay up.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to hear the Senator say that.

Mr. FRAZIER. I desire to read a sentence from the concluding part of the telegram from this representative of the millers of New York on the subject of rye. He says:

Unless the rye farmers are protected with the proper duty, they are liable to get 25 cents per bushel for their 1935 rye crop.

Mr. McKELLAR. Right there, I recall and the Senator from North Dakota recalls that in 1930, 1931, 1932, and 1933, perhaps, the same cry was raised about wheat—that unless we had a higher tariff on wheat, wheat would go down in price; but wheat went down even when we did put an increased tariff on it. The Senator recalls that?

Mr. FRAZIER. Oh, yes; I know that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why does the Senator want to try out again a theory which has been repudiated by the facts in agricultural prices?

Mr. FRAZIER. The fact is that I do not like to see rye coming into the United States, cutting down our markets. Rye is worth only about half the price of corn.

Mr. McKELLAR. That simplifies the situation very much. The Senator, then, is talking about rye, and he is in favor of the splendid increases in the prices of all other agricultural products. Is not that true?

Mr. FRAZIER. I certainly am in favor of increases in prices, but I should like to see the rye farmers protected, and the flax and other farmers protected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator still have faith that they might be protected by a protective tariff?

Mr. FRAZIER. Of course; there is no question that if the tariff on rye were higher—it is only 15 cents a bushel—if it were double what it is it would result either in the price of rye being raised or a good deal of the imports of rye being kept out.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator recalls the situation several years ago in connection with the tariff on wheat. His recollection about the tariff rate will be better than mine. Let us assume that it was 21 cents a bushel.

Mr. FRAZIER. It was 42 cents.

Mr. McKELLAR. Forty-two cents a bushel. It was 21 cents, and the Congress raised that to 42 cents, according to the recollection of the Senator?

Mr. FRAZIER. That is the figure to which it was raised.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was about half that, and we raised it to 42 cents, and the price of wheat went down the next day.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I take it for granted that the Senator is making an answer to the remarks of the Senator from Michigan, and in that connection may I ask the Senator from Tennessee whether the Senator from Michigan referred to the international balance sheet prepared by Mr. Peek?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; he did.

Mr. TYDINGS. Anyone who will read that document will see that we have a visible and invisible balance of trade with the world of $381,000,000. Yet Mr. Peek claims that because we bought gold we turned that favorable balance of trade into an unfavorable balance of trade.

Let me point out that, in my judgment, that is an error on the part of Mr. Peek, because when we bought that gold we gave paper money, in effect, for the gold, and we have the gold. In the gold we have an asset. Mr. Peek counts our gold as a liability. Certainly, if we gave our money for that gold and put the gold into the Treasury, we still have the gold, and that asset offsets the liability; so we still have a favorable balance of trade of $381,000,000 according to Mr. Peek's own statement. Therefore the remarks made by the Senator from Michigan were not accurate if they were based on this statement, because, in spite of Mr. Peek's own reasoning, we maintained a favorable balance of trade of $381,000,000 for the year 1934, and there cannot be set up as a liability the gold we bought, as Mr. Peek attempts to do, unless he, at the same time, sets up that gold as an asset, because we have the gold which we bought, and we could sell that gold tomorrow and get our money back.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I thank the Senator, and I agree with him entirely. My judgment is that if this country should undertake to do away with its foreign trade, it would make the most monumental mistake it would be possible to make.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator permit one more interruption?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. A simple illustration of what I have been attempting to point out would be a case such as this: Suppose a grocer bought two and a half dozen eggs for a dollar; he would give the farmer a dollar for the eggs; he would have the two and a half dozen eggs in his store ready to be sold at some future time. But under Mr. Peek's reasoning, he would set up the dollar as a liability, because the grocer paid a dollar for those eggs, and he would not set up the two and a half dozen eggs which he had in his store as an asset, which he could immediately sell, and get back his dollar, and probably some profit. That is the reasoning in this whole matter, and it is specious. I think Mr. Peek is sincere, but he is not accurate. In spite of Mr. Peek's statement, we still have a proven visible and invisible balance of trade with the world of $381,000,000, and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who is a Presidential candidate, I understand, would throw away that favorable balance; he would stop trading with the world, he would have less commerce, and if we had less commerce, we would have less employment. He is proceeding on the theory that everything the administration has done has been wrong because it has constricted our market; yet he would go still further by lopping off our foreign trade.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not understand that. Of course then I yield the floor and take my seat.

Mr. BLACK. I thought the Senator from Tennessee had the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. A point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. I make the point of order that the Senator from Vermont cannot farm out the time without losing the floor himself.

Mr. TYDINGS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not know I had yielded the floor. I have just yielded to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] to ask the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] a question, which I think ought to be asked.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Vermont has had the floor a long time, but other Senators have been doing the talking. What I am objecting to, and I think it is hardly necessary to call it to the attention of Senators, is that they are simply helping the Senator from Vermont to carry on a one-man filibuster. He is doing that without himself talking. We ought to compel him to do the talking.

Mr. BLACK. Will the Senator from Vermont yield to me for a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield for a question.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator from North Dakota made a statement about rye and its value, and he said he was fearful the producers of rye would get only 25 cents a bushel next year. All I wanted to find out was what the price of rye is today, and if the price did not go down to 7 cents when it was at its lowest.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Mr. NORRIS. I raise a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. I object now to the Senator from Vermont yielding the floor for other Senators to make speeches unless the Chair holds that he loses the floor by doing so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2357, proposing to amend the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. The Senator from Vermont will proceed in order, and can yield only for a question.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for only a moment?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I overheard the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] referring to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] as seeking the Presidency, or the nomination. I ask, Should not my able friend from Maryland secure the presence of the Senator from Michigan, if there is to be a reflection on his character and intellect, by the intimation that he would be so unwise as to take the Republican nomination for the Presidency? [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, if that question were addressed to me, I am inclined to think that I should answer in the affirmative.

WASHINGTON-LINCOLN MEMORIAL-GETTYSBURG BOULEVARD

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 43) for the establishment of a commission for the construction of a Washington-Lincoln Memorial-Gettysburg Boulevard connecting the present Lincoln Memorial in the city of Washington with the battlefield of Gettysburg in the State of Pennsylvania, which were, on page 2, line 1, to strike out "10" and insert "13"; on the same page, line 8, after "Senate", to insert "the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, Department of Agriculture; the Director, National Park Service, Department of Interior; Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia"; on the same page, line 20, after the word "plans", to insert "in cooperation with the Bureau of Public Roads, Department of Agriculture; the Highway Departments of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and District of Columbia", and on page 3, line 17, after the word "enacted", to insert a comma and "provided such enabling legislation stipulates that the said highway or boulevard shall be constructed by the Highway Departments of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and District of Columbia, under the supervision of the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, Department of Agriculture, from funds provided by the said State of Pennsylvania, the said State of Maryland, and the District of Columbia, including any future allocation of Federal-aid highway funds or grants to the said States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and to the District of Columbia. The passage of this act does not commit the United States to build the said highway or boulevard at Federal expense, and if authorized the Federal funds for the construction of the said highway or boulevard will be the allocations that may accrue to the said States and the District of Columbia in future appropriations of Federal-aid highway and grant funds. Any appropriations under the authority of this act shall be deducted from the next regular apportionment or allocation of Federal-aid highway funds or Federal-grant highway funds, under existing or future authorizations as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, to Pennsylvania, Maryland, and the District of Columbia."

Mr. TYDINGS. I am familiar with the amendments made by the House of Representatives to this joint resolution. It is a local matter, and I, therefore, move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HEARINGS ON BANKING ACT OF 1935

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 20), which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed for its use 1,000 copies of the hearings held during the current session before said committee relative to the bill (H. R. 5357) to provide for the sound, effective, and uninterrupted operation of the banking system, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am familiar with the subject matter of the concurrent resolution just read, and I am prepared to state that the printing of additional copies of the hearings is necessary. I therefore move that the Senate concur in the concurrent resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. NORRIS to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2357) to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont is not conducting a filibuster at all. Up to this time he has not had an opportunity to address the Senate respecting the pending question.

The matter before us is whether the Senate will agree to proceed with the consideration of Senate bill 2357, which is a measure introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] for the purpose of amending the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933.

I object to proceeding to the consideration of that bill for certain reasons which I shall endeavor to present to the Senate with as much moderation and self-control and fairness as the place and the occasion and the consideration of this question permit. I make that comment by way of introduction because I believe that, upon consideration of the bare facts, the Senate should feel impelled unanimously to object to the consideration of this measure.

What is it, to begin with, we are asked to proceed to consider? If the Senate were to accept the report filed by the committee, it would come to the conclusion that the measure is most inconsequential and unimportant. The report consists of two small paragraphs filling the center of one sheet of paper of the customary size used for such reports, and the report is as follows:

The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred Senate bill 2357, amending Public, No. 17, of the Seventy-third Congress, the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report thereon as follows.

All I have read so far constitutes one of the two paragraphs, and it merely identifies the bill. Now we come to the report:

We recommend the passage of the bill S. 2357. The bill amends the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933. None of the amendments are of very great importance, but all are desirable in carrying out the intent and purposes of the act. It has been found in practical operation that these amendments are necessary in order to clear up any doubt as to the operation of the law and to clarify and make plain some of the provisions of the act. It is believed that this bill will accomplish that result.

Mr. President, the bill which the Senate is asked to take up and proceed with embraces 13 pages. I need only to point to one or two features of the bill to show how very unfair is the report on it and to what extent the Senate of the United States and the people of America would be misled if they should accept the report and proceed to act upon this proposed legislation.

Consider for just one moment that section 9 of the bill reads in part as follows:

That section 15 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 15. With the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Corporation is authorized to issue bonds not to exceed in the aggregate $100,000,000 outstanding at any one time"—

"Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed", that he has grown so great that he will take into his roomy maw $100,000,000 and regard it as a matter of no very great importance?

However, that is only one of the features of the bill. Let me call the Senate's attention to the fact that the whole plan of T. V. A. came to the Congress with a view of a limited power in the Corporation to do certain definite things and then stop, unless upon an examination and report to the Congress the Corporation were further authorized to proceed.

Now what do we find the situation to be? This private corporation, this institution into which the Government converted itself—for when we passed the T. V. A. Act, the Government of the United States converted itself into a private business corporation—has gone ahead under that limited grant of the T. V. A. and undertaken the construction of works not contemplated by the act; it has entered upon a social program not authorized to be entered into; it has acquired money not authorized by the act; it has deviated from the authority granted by the act to capitalize itself, and has exceeded its rights even as a private corporation to such an extent that it has had to be enjoined in a court of law for an ultra vires act. Now, we, the Senate of the United States, have brought before us, upon the slightest consideration—almost no consideration by any standing committee of the Senate—a bill which undertakes to patch up and to plaster here and there these defects, these breaches, and to fix up these defalcations, these excess expenditures, these violations of the law, by an act of Congress.

I ask the Senate, if I proceed no further in an analysis of what the bill proposes to do, what is the Senate's answer to the question whether this bill, as reported by the committee, is a matter of no very great importance, one that we should take up at once on a motion to proceed to its consideration? And when a single Senator rises from his chair and asks for the floor for the purpose of opposing a motion to proceed with the consideration of that kind of bill, he is charged on the record with conducting a one-man filibuster.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield for a question, though I am under a sort of cloture.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is more familiar than I am with the bill under consideration. I understand, and I ask the Senator to tell me whether or not my understanding is correct, that of the money allocated for this project, the T. V. A., $50,000,000 remains unexpended or unused, the authorization remains unused, and under this bill $100,000,000 more would be added to the project. Is that correct?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I understand it is not correct, and that the total amount would be $100,000,000; but, if the Senator will observe the language of the bill, that is an open-end mortgage. It runs to $100,000,000 at any time in the future; and, regardless of whether or not we retire any of the bonds, if we do retire any of them we still have this running authority to place upon the homes of the people of the United States a mortgage for $100,000,000; and yet, forsooth, we must at once adopt a motion to proceed with the bill on the ground that it is a wholly unimportant affair.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am asking merely for information, because I am not familiar with the matter, and I know the Senator from Vermont is; and I may say that I am in agreement with much that he says. May I ask the Senator if the fund originally authorized has been used in full? If not used in full, how much of the fund remains to be used in the future?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am glad to treat of that subject immediately, although I intended to take it up in a different order.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then I shall not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. AUSTIN. In answer to the question, I will say graphically and briefly that advantage has never yet been taken of the $50,000,000 authorization for a bond issue. On the contrary, the Tennessee Valley Authority—this private corporation, consisting of three persons—saw fit to take out of the Treasury of the United States, by other and devious and unauthorized means, treble the amount authorized in the T. V. A. Act, and never touched the $50,000,000 really authorized by the act; and they had the boldness to admit that their object in doing that was to get all they could before they had to rely on the $50,000,000 bond issue. So they have done, and so they have expended in the brief time since June 1933, $250,000,000, in round numbers, which is five times the amount of the authority contained in the act; and all this huge expenditure of money has taken place in the 2-year period from June 1933 to the present time—if we extend it to June 1935.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for another question?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand, then, the $50,000,000 of unused authorization, plus the $100,000,000 of new authorization, would make $150,000,000 altogether, would it not?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I do not construe the amendment in that manner. I regard the amendment as in the nature of a substitute for the $50,000,000 authorized in the original act.

Mr. TYDINGS. That was the point upon which I desired to be clarified. I thank the Senator for doing so.

Mr. AUSTIN. However, on the question of whether we should now proceed to the consideration of the bill, we cannot overlook the fact that the limitations placed in laws undertaking to keep within legal bounds an authority that is delegated and limited amount to nothing. We have already seen that by means of the various experiments upon which the Government of the United States has entered it has become possible, and is therefore taken advantage of, for a private business corporation which represents the United States of America to exceed its authorization five times over in the course of 2 years. So what is the significance of the limitation in the proposed act of $100,000,000?

Mr. President, before proceeding to a more detailed statement of facts, which I feel sure will shock the Senate into a determined opposition to any further procedure on this bill until it can be referred to a committee of the Senate and considered as all substantial and important business of the people of this country ought to be considered, I wish to call attention to the course the bill has pursued. It was, after being introduced in the Senate, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, although it purports to have to do, as a primary purpose, with the national defense and navigable rivers, of which the War Department and the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate have the normal, natural, usual jurisdiction. When the bill went to the Agricultural Committee, what consideration was given to it, carrying as it does an authorization of $100,000,000 of bonds, besides other powers to which I shall later refer?

The committee met on the 10th day of April at 10 o'clock in the forenoon; it adjourned at 12 o'clock noon that day; and during those 2 hours it considered this bill and one other, and reported, with the very illuminating explanation which I read at the outset of my remarks. Was a witness heard? Were the views of the War Department considered? Were the interests of John Citizen in the placing of a mortgage on his house consulted? Who knew anything about it? Did you, my colleagues, hear of it? Yet, in the confusion immediately following the vote on the bonus bill, a motion is made to proceed to the consideration of the bill and there is resentment at the opposition of any Senator who tries to stop this headlong course for a sufficient length of time to enable the people of the country to know what the Senate is doing with such an important matter.

That is not the only reason why the Senate should oppose the pending motion. There is another very important reason to be considered before we come to the shocking details. A bill which corresponds to this bill in almost every detail, introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative McSWAIN, was referred in that body to the Military Affairs Committee to which such a bill normally, usually, and properly is referred. That committee held hearings on March 28, 29, and 30, and April 2, 3, 9, and 10. They took the testimony of witnesses.

Has there been any report on that bill? No. That committee of the House of Representatives is considering the House bill. It has also called upon the Tennessee Valley Authority for additional information, which that Authority has promised to furnish but has not as yet furnished, although nearly a month has elapsed since the last date of hearing.

Now, my colleague, I ask you, in view of that situation, in view of our obligation to our country, ought we to proceed to the consideration of this bill, which corresponds to the bill to which I have just referred, without waiting for the publication of the hearings on the latter bill? Ought we not at least to take a course deliberate enough to enable Senators to have the advantage of the testimony taken before the committee of the House of Representatives? What harm will ensue by waiting for that testimony?

I have taken pains to ascertain, so far as I could, what are the prospects of obtaining printed copies of the hearings, and have been advised that perhaps in a week such copies may be obtained. What would be the injury to this private corporation, in connection with whose activities so much interest and anxiety is shown here for speed, if the Senate should await the publication of those hearings and have an opportunity to learn some of the facts, something of the interest behind this measure and of its probable effects?

I am informed and believe that the testimony, if we could have it, would tend to show a most astonishing and shocking situation of affairs. I am informed that the testimony would tend to put us on guard as trustees of the public welfare and cause us to pause ere we give greater authority than we have already given to three men, organized into a private business corporation to act in the capacity of the Government of the United States—a form of deviation from our powers and our rights which I regard as one of the most dangerous ventures upon which a government can ever enter.

I am informed that there was an audit by the Comptroller General, which will be found in the evidence taken by the House committee and which should be available to the Senate before we proceed to grant this authority to issue bonds, bonds which will fall not upon the private corporation alone, as they generally do in the case of other private corporations, but bonds which will fall upon the individual taxpayer, as was not the case under the first bill, the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933. This bill, apparently so innocent and so unimportant, carries over from this private corporation to the backs of the people of America the obligation of those bonds.

I am advised that when we obtain that evidence we will find that the Comptroller General found abuses, excesses of authority, violations of the law, overpayment of salaries, contracts made in the teeth of the law, overpayment of contractors, the most astounding state of affairs that has ever occurred in the handling of the public money of the United States, and cautioning us that whenever we are asked to turn over such authority as was turned over to the T. V. A., to be administered by three citizens incorporated into a corporation, we are doing an extremely hazardous act. We are asked to injure the people of this country financially and morally.

Listen, Mr. President, to what I believe this evidence will show—and this is only a paragraph of it:

The nature of exceptions—

Meaning the exceptions by the Comptroller General—established consists of purchases without competition, in violation of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes—

Which, if I have time, I will read into the Record, and which requires bids. Purchases may not be made save in instances of emergency without taking bids—

Emergency purchases unsupported by showing of emergency; modifications of specifications—

It seems as though we have previously heard something about that type of violation of good faith—awards on basis of personal preference; dual compensation; excessive allowances and reimbursement of traveling expenses to prospective employees; payment of per diem at designated posts of duty; allowance of overtime to annual employees; allowance of charge for personally owned motor vehicles without prior authorization; overpayment on pay rolls; payment of pay rolls without administrative approval; subscription to newspapers and periodicals in excess of statutory limitations; payment for rented office equipment lost or stolen; payment for power plants, transmission lines, and real estate acquired without having clear title thereto; rent for land occupied by Civilian Conservation Corps camps paid at rates higher than for land purchased outright; lump-sum payments under cost-plus contracts and fees without original invoices and in excess of reported progress of work; claims paid for loss and damage to property; apparent overpayments on electric equipment under annual agreements; cost of reconditioning plant agreed by contract to be for payment account of losses; rent for buildings without evidence showing that payments are not in excess of 15 percent of fair market value; pre-audited certified vouchers increased and payments made to vendors in excess of amounts shown on the invoices; allowances in expense accounts for bridge toll ticket books before such books have been used; loans to cooperative associations without security; hire of special conveyances, such as busses and airplanes, for visitors and students; and noncompliance with contractual provisions for insurance protection covering personal injury.

Mr. President, I have read a quotation of but one paragraph of a quite voluminous record which I am informed will show to the Senate in detail an astonishing situation resulting from the legislation which the bill proposes to amend.

Let us consider the vital question of capital set-up. When I came to the Senate in 1931 my ears were filled with voices criticizing public-utility corporations, particularly on the ground that they were carrying their properties at an overstatement of actual value. All kinds of bills and proposals came before us with the view of knocking the value out of them. It was called "water", it was called "inflation", it was called various things, but the whole purpose was to discredit and injure the status and the good will of private corporations engaged in producing electrical energy and gas. I have believed from time to time that it did have that effect.

Of course the argument made at that time was that these capital figures had been made out and had been written up in order that the income of the corporations might be represented to the public and to employees as being at a lower rate of return. That awful crime, if it were such, was made the most of. As a matter of fact, it was answered by showing that the shares of stock had gone out into the world and been paid for with hard cash of people here and there all over the world, so that actual money in most instances was behind every dollar invested.

But what do we find the same critics doing here? One of the objects stated on the platform and in the public press from time to time by those who are interested in the T. V. A. service has been that "it is a yardstick." "This will furnish a standard of measure by which we will club down private enterprises. We will beat them in competition for the business of America. Ultimately we will destroy them and drive them out of the market and supplant them with electrical energy and gas produced by the United States of America."

Here is the first experiment. It has been operating in the most experimental manner for only 2 years. The very first and only balance sheet that has ever been produced shows what with respect to capitalization? Oh, the pendulum has swung clear to the other extreme. Regardless now of what the Government paid for these properties, regardless of what the properties are actually worth, they have been written down until it was hoped to bring about a standard or a yardstick so low that no private corporation on earth could ever equal it or compete with it.

Let us see about that. Is it so or is it a mere general statement?

The bill should not be proceeded with because we expect that the record, when published and brought to the Senate, will show the following data extracted from page 394 of the audits of accounts of the Tennessee Valley Authority by the Comptroller General of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934:

Plant transferred to the Tennessee Valley Authority

Cost of plant no. 1.....	$13,757,807.58
Cost of plant no. 2.....	71,181,526.57
Total.....	84,939,334.15

Mr. President, at the very first shot we find that the limit of authority under the Tennessee Valley Authority's Act of 1933 has been broken—$84,900,000, whereas the limit prescribed in the act was $50,000,000. The people of the United States of America never before knew that this private corporation was about to enter upon an enterprise whose capitalization would exceed $50,000,000, the amount limited by the act.

Oh, but this is just the beginning—"only the beginning"! I proceed:

Wilson Dam, power plant and equipment—not including the locks—$46,971,995 and some cents.

Warrior-Sheffield transmission line, including Gorgas steam plant, $5,012,643 and some odd cents.

Making a total of $136,923,973 plus. That is almost three times $50,000,000, but that is not the end of it.

Less sale Warrior-Sheffield properties, $3,472,487—not reading the cents.

Balance, $133,451,486.

Add inventories, $880,963.

Total, $134,332,450.

Less loss on Warrior-Sheffield properties sale, $1,540,156.

Balance, net transfer to T. V. A., $132,792,294.

It is safe to assume, is it not, that this was a transaction between a willing vendor and a willing purchaser, and that that valuation probably was correct? What did they do, however, in order to carry out the objective of having a yardstick? Of course, they were confronted with the question of whether they could ever make a return on that amount of money invested in their capital structure that would show in the black. So what do they do? They write it down, and they account for it all on their books with a set-up of 38 percent of the cost of the property transferred; that is to say, $51,000,000. Now, they are almost down to the authority granted by the act.

Mr. President, every business man knows that there is another thing connected with that set-up, and that is the subject of depreciation; and when annually that Corporation set down in its books, in an honest and fair manner, the amount of depreciation which naturally, economically should be set down, if it was based on that large valuation it would take the heart right out of any earnings the T. V. A. ever should make.

Mr. President, they were not content, so far as depreciation went, with writing down arbitrarily to $51,000,000 this property which was actually worth $132,000,000 plus—oh, no! They must deviate from the customary method of figuring depreciation, and so they do not take a certain percentage annually of their capital investment of $51,000,000. They took even so low a rate of depreciation as 2 percent as the annual sum they would have to deduct and set aside before they declared their profit would be a million dollars. Do you expect the Government in business to earn a million dollars out of T. V. A.? No; so they do not use that method at all. They undertake an arbitrary and a new rule of figuring depreciation based on their income, a percentage of their income.

If we should proceed no further, Mr. President, we have arrived at the point where we know that in the Military Affairs Committee of the House there is a fund of information of the utmost value for the Senate to consider before proceeding to the consideration of the bill which is the subject of the motion of the Senator from Nebraska; but the fact is that I intend to bring to the attention of the Senate, before I take my seat, 23 other pages of specifications which, in my opinion, become more interesting, more exciting to our caution, than the writing down of the capital of this great Corporation.

Let us inquire where this Corporation got the money that it spent. We know that it regarded and treated the bond-issue authorization as a backlog, and did not intend to use it, and did not use it. Therefore, where did the Corporation get its money? Let us see.

First. They dipped into the National Industrial Recovery Act. That is, there was an allotment made by the National Industrial Recovery Administration, under the act approved June 16, 1933, of $50,000,000, equal to the entire authorization contained in the original act. Did Congress have any idea that that money ever would be used to finance a private business corporation which was going to be engaged, among other things, in producing electrical appliances and marketing them to the ultimate consumer? I doubt it. That is just one item.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, what was the date?

Mr. AUSTIN. The date of the act was June 16, 1933. I am informed that the allotment was made in July of that year.

Second. This amount came out of another fund. By the Emergency Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1935, approved June 19, 1934, there was appropriated $25,000,000.

Third. By allotment to Electric Home and Farm Authority, incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware, for invested capital, allotment from the N. I. R. A. fund, $1,000,000.

Fourth. Loans to Electric Home and Farm Authority from Reconstruction Finance Corporation, $10,000,000.

Fifth. By allotment from Emergency Relief Administration funds to Tennessee Cooperatives, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Tennessee, $300,000.

Eighth. Revenue from sale of power, and interest thereon, according to annual report of T. V. A., $824,892.11; less current operating expense of $276,234.53; net, $548,657.58.

These figures total $86,848,657.58, but they do not represent all. Items 6 and 7, which I skipped, are as follows:

Sixth. Use of C. C. C. workers, variously reported as from 5,000 to 6,000 men, figures not available, but paid through the C. C. C. organization.

Seventh. Civil Works Administration employees, figures on number and cost not available.

Of course, we should consider, on a motion to proceed with this bill, the probability that if the law had been observed, if the T. V. A. Act had been followed, we should not now be confronted with the necessity of patching it up, and fixing up these breaches in the wall.

Mr. President, I desire to observe, in passing, something which has struck me not only as of literary value but as a profound truth, something which was brought to my attention when I was in the Orient, namely:

Rotten wood cannot be carved, nor walls of sand be plastered.

That bill, as originally drawn, exceeded any power Congress had. It stepped out into the realm where three men were enabled to take the taxes of the people and transmit them here and there without their being budgeted, and without the safeguards which the people wrote into the covenant by which the Congress was authorized to do business for them.

Mr. President, this is a quick retribution for the action of Congress. Within 2 years we are now confronted with 5 or 6 days of evidence before the Committee on Military Affairs of mismanagement, of waste of the people's money, of violation of the statutory law, and at present by a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill which would make those things all white, and all clean, and all right, and perfectly lawful.

I say the Senate should pause long enough to let John Citizen know what is about to take place as affecting his rights and his property.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield for a question. I have been limited to yielding for a question.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was not able to hear the Senator's last statement and I wish he would repeat it. He said the Senate should pause long enough to do something.

Mr. AUSTIN. Long enough to let John Citizen know what is proposed.

I was trying to personify that great group whose houses are about to be mortgaged by this bill; that is all.

If we wait long enough before we proceed to the consideration of the bill, we will have a balance sheet of assets and liabilities of the corporation. We will learn how much money, if any, the United States makes when it enters into business.

I am informed that we will learn that the United States operated at a loss of $62,910 in that business, which consisted of the production and sale of electrical energy, and that it never sold one dollar's worth of fertilizer.

Although we were led to believe, when we enacted the T. V. A. Act, that the corporation would have definite and specific powers, and limited purposes, curiously enough the corporation has become an eleemosynary corporation, a social organization, and it has entered upon all kinds of activities outside those named in its authority. Thus we find donations appropriated by it to various activities like the C. W. A. I find a record of a donation of $58,338.91 made by this corporation, which now comes in and asks us to proceed to the consideration of a bill to permit it to borrow $100,000,000, to be payable by the people of the United States, if this corporation fails to earn money enough to pay the debt.

Mr. President, I am speaking at some disadvantage, not having the records. They have not yet been printed, and I have been obliged to take the minutes of someone else who could get only extracts for my use today. This matter came up suddenly last evening.

I find an item of power production expense of $252,556.17, to which must be added depreciation, $82,618.74; taxes, $41,573.07; maintenance and operation, $447,594.65, making a total of power production expense of $824,342.64.

Deducting from that the return from power transmitted to United States agencies, amounting to $25,675.56, we find that the net expense is $798,667.08. The income was such that there was a net loss of $62,910.17.

Mr. President, on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill, should we not pause and consider that in the Committee on Military Affairs there is evidence which we are informed and believe will show that loss was greater than that represented on their books, which have been kept in the manner in which they saw fit to keep them, and not according to the standard method required of public-utility companies in nearly every State of the Union. We ought to know whether that loss was really $62,000 or was $1,062,000, figured according to the standards applied to private corporations engaged in a similar enterprise and not backed by the Government, because it is said that this activity is to be the yardstick applied to private corporations.

When we obtain the evidence it will tend to show that this corporation has engaged in all kinds of activities not contemplated by the original act. I have mentioned only a few of them; time will not permit me to mention them all.

Apparently those in charge believed that because the original act did not enable them to engage in the business of selling refrigerators, curling machines, household aids of various kinds operated by electrical energy, nevertheless they had the power to go up into Delaware and form another corporation which would have that authority. So we find them spreading out, the shadow of their great hand falling over a large part of the United States of America, with a threat that they not only intend to have this a yardstick, but a model and a form for all communities in this great land of ours.

They will force competitors in the immediate neighborhood out of business by writing down their properties, bought at millions and millions of dollars, to a point where the return is so low that, when measured with the return of an honest corporation, it makes the honest corporation appear before the public as looting the public, thereby destroying its good will, and ultimately destroying its ability to serve. Thus they will reach out and cover the whole land with a network of these T. V. A.'s.

They will secure reports on how to develop every river in the United States. Did we not hear something of that before in the Senate—that a report is to be obtained as to how all the rivers of the United States may be developed in order to put the Government into business at the expense and at the cost of the death of legitimate private enterprise?

Here is an interesting extract which I believe will be found in the records of the Military Affairs Committee of the House, and ought to be considered, among other things, before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of this bill. The following is an extract from the minutes of the board of directors of T. V. A. at its meeting on October 24, 1933, and was introduced in evidence in the case of Ashwander against T. V. A., in the Federal court at Birmingham, as plaintiff's exhibit 41-k:

1. The Authority will cause to be put into effect, through agencies buying its current, rates low enough to produce a favorable market for the purchase and utilization of heavy-use appliances. The Authority further will seek to provide means to finance on a large scale the manufacture of standard equipment of this class and will seek, through promotion, etc., to facilitate the sale and utilization of this equipment.

Mr. President, I ask whether there is anything in the language of the T. V. A. Act which justifies the interpretation that the Government of the United States, through its Congress, was entering into such a business as that, even under the guise of a corporation? Of course, I am a firm believer in the principle that what the Government cannot do directly it cannot do indirectly, and that it matters not whether the Government undertakes to deal through one corporation or a string of them, as it has tried to do and is doing today with T. V. A. and its subsidiary corporations; it has no authority under the sun to engage in such business as that which the board of directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority launched upon in that resolution.

That resolution is a vital organic act of the Government of the United States. Of course, I believe such action to be wrong; but until it runs its course, and some such great jurist as Judge Grubb, of the northern district of Alabama, has the courage to stand up and pronounce such acts unconstitutional and void, they will be administered with devastating effect, frightening business, and destroying any possible hope of recovery; for we may be sure, Mr. President, that just so long as this sword hangs over the head of business, there will be no recovery.

There can be no recovery without confidence. There can be no recovery without the flow of capital into the channels of trade. There can be no recovery without reemployment, and there can be no reemployment without the flow of capital into trade. Capital will stay in hiding just so long as there is the threat of the great and powerful Government of the United States invading its field and destroying it. That is more than a threat. That is the execution of a purpose not contained in the act of Congress which is sought to be amended by this proposed amendment which we are asked to proceed to the consideration of without any opposition!

I now call the attention of the Senate to another piece of evidence as to what may be expected to be found in the record which the Senate should have, and the people of America should know about, when we come to the consideration of this bill.

The following is taken from the minutes of the Board of Directors of T. V. A. at its meeting on October 13, 1933, which was introduced in evidence in the case of Ashwander against T. V. A. in the Federal court at Birmingham as plaintiff's exhibit 5. Just remember that we have here the directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority sitting around the table, and what they do by resolution is a vital act of the United States, acting through Congress. Here it is:

The question was raised as to whether or not the power program which is being set up will provide a yardstick which can be applied with accuracy to the power industry. The consensus of opinion was that an accurate yardstick might be developed within 3 or 4 years if the Authority's power operations can be centered in a delimited area.

Arthur E. Morgan suggested that the Authority issue a statement of policy which would put it in a position of making a fair and practical attempt in a delimited area to develop a real yardstick which could be applied to the power industry.

David E. Lillenthal stressed the fact that the Authority must work toward an increase in the use of electricity as its main power outlet, and that increased usage of current would benefit both utility companies and the Authority. He called attention to the possibility of marketing electrical appliances and suggested that the Authority get permission from Congress to do this. This proposal met with the general approval of the board members.

Mr. President, that is a very important declaration. They knew they had no right or power or authority to engage in the enterprise spoken of in the resolution of October 24. This was only 11 days subsequent to the time when they were telling themselves, "We know it is wrong to do that. We know the Congress of the United States had no right to vest in us such an authority. There is not a word in the T. V. A. Act which expressly or impliedly gives us any right to do this thing. If we are going to do it, we must conform to the part of the T. V. A. Act which permits a study and a plan; and when we make the plan to include this power—which we have not—we must go back to Congress and ask Congress for the authority to do this thing."

That is what they knew. On October 13, 1933, they made such a declaration, which can be found in this evidence which we so much need; and on October 24, within 11 days thereafter, we find them putting into effect this thing which they doubted they had the authority to do, and which they decided unanimously they must go to Congress to get the power to do.

What happened, Mr. President? Where is the authority? Where did they go when in doubt? When they all agreed, as they did, that they had no right, no power, no authority to do a certain thing, what do Senators suppose happened between the 13th of October and the 24th which caused them to do just exactly the thing which they all said they had no right to do? I do not know, but I have an idea that before we proceed with the consideration of this bill we should examine the evidence before the committee, and perhaps we should call witnesses who will tell us what they did, from whom they got the right and the power to do that which is set forth in the following:

The Authority will cause to be put into effect, through agencies buying its current, rates low enough to produce a favorable market for the purchase and utilization of heavy-use appliances. The Authority further will seek to provide means to finance on a large scale the manufacture of standard equipment of this class, and will seek, through promotion, etc., to facilitate the sale and utilization of this equipment.

Before we consider the proposal to increase the grant of power as provided in the terms of the proposed amendment to the T. V. A. Act, let us know, and let the citizens of the country know, what was the effect of the act we passed in 1933 when we created the T. V. A. What was its effect? Did it give a limited authority which would be adhered to, or was it regarded by the administration as an open sesame, as an opportunity to increase and grow and become great and strong and encompass all the things that might be necessary or unnecessary in order to put out of existence private enterprise engaged in public utilities?

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I regret that I have been compelled to attend a meeting of the Judiciary Committee of which the Senator is a member, and so I have not heard any of his statements except during the past few minutes. I assume from what the Senator has said, and from what I have heard that this organization projected a very comprehensive plan not only to develop power at the place in question but to penetrate distant areas so far as it could transmit power; also to engage in manufacturing articles and commodities, and also to form a corporation for the purpose of engaging in the buying and selling of electrical appliances. Has the Senator discovered whether any such power, which apparently is outlined in these minutes, has been exercised by this organization?

Mr. AUSTIN. It has, and the extent to which it has been exercised should be before the Senate before we undertake to consider the amendment of the T. V. A. Act contemplated by the bill of the Senator from Nebraska. I am unable to state, and I could not possibly carry in my memory, the details. There is a vast enterprise down there which keeps growing more Gargantuan all the time. One power breeds desire for another power. They had authority to build 2 dams and already they have launched upon the building of 5 dams. We are told there is evidence which tends to show it is their purpose to build 20 or 30 dams. Mr. President, it is of great interest to the taxpayers of the country to know what kind of a giant has the citizen by the neck at the present time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Where would the organization obtain the means with which to purchase, as I assume it must purchase, the additional land which would be overflowed in the construction of the additional dams, and where would it get the money with which to purchase the additional land which would be overflowed if they should erect 8 or 10 dams or the number of dams indicated by the Senator?

Mr. AUSTIN. Great versatility has been shown by the Tennessee Valley Authority in obtaining funds. The Corporation was organized with authority for a bond issue of $50,000,000 under the original T. V. A. Act. Does not the Senator know that not one dollar of money has been raised under the authority granted in that act? Probably he does not know that, but it is a fact. They can get money today. When the purse strings of the people are put into the hands of the Chief Executive, with almost unlimited authority over the purse of the people, we have the example of a private business corporation organized by the Government reaching into that purse at any time for any purpose. Thus they took out of that purse, as I have shown in detail, $130,000,000 in just the short period of time they have been in existence, from June 1933.

What do they say about it? "Oh, well, we are going to get all the money we can in this manner before we resort to the bonds. The bonds are a backlog. We hold them there in order to keep the fire going. We do not need them. We can get the money all right."

Now they come here with a bill to amend the act. The bill is reported as being quite innocent. The report from the committee informs the Senate and the people of the United States that—

None of the amendments are of very great importance, but all are desirable in carrying out the intent and purposes of the act.

One of the amendments proposes to double the amount of money and to broaden out the time and the power so that this may be an open-end mortgage and there can be in existence at any time from now ad infinitum $100,000,000 of those bonds.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is there anything in the bill, or in any of the hearings which have been had, where authority is given to execute bonds for $100,000,000, by which it is planned to repay the fund from which the $130,000,000 has been drawn? I did not know about that.

Mr. AUSTIN. That question brings to the front the importance of not proceeding to the consideration of the bill until we secure that evidence or until we find the facts from an investigation through a committee of the Senate, because no committee of the Senate has investigated it. I do not know and I cannot answer the question of the Senator from Utah. We do know there was no security given for any of these funds. Whether there exists a note or promise which differs from a bond, I do not know. Certain it is that the Corporation had no authority from the Congress to give any obligation except to the extent of $50,000,000. If it did, that obligation is ultra vires and in the hands of some claimants it could be blocked. I am not saying that in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States it could be blocked.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Minton in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Assuming the validity of the act under which the T. V. A. was incorporated and authorized to borrow $50,000,000, would it have the authority to borrow money without executing bonds—to borrow money on notes or on credit, or to borrow money from the public-works fund without giving security consisting of the bonds which it was authorized to execute?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is a legal question. I have an impression that it is an incident of its power as a corporation to make such loans as might be temporary in their nature and necessary to anticipate its income from time to time, but beyond that, when it undertook to make a capital loan, if it ever did, then it would be limited to the authority expressly given to it, and to no other authority. No other authority did it have, and no other type of security could it issue, save that which the Congress directed. We are all familiar with the custom and practice throughout the life of our Nation of municipal corporations borrowing for a short period in anticipation of the collection of taxes, without any special act of the legislature; but whenever a municipal corporation undertakes to make a capital loan, we know that invariably it is necessary for the legislature to grant authority and to tell the municipal corporation how it must and can do it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think perhaps the statement just made by the Senator requires the qualification that a municipality may not borrow for temporary purposes or for capital investment unless authorized, and within the limits authorized by its charter.

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly. I should have interpolated the parenthetical statement that it must keep within the authority granted to it, and the authority must be contained in its charter.

In further answer to the question of the Senator from Utah with respect to these activities, I call attention to the fact that in carrying out the purpose expressed in the resolution of the board of directors, which I have twice read, a corporation was created, without the consent of Congress, in the State of Delaware and by its authority. The purpose of this corporation was to encourage people to purchase electrical appliances on the installment plan, one of the practices which experts say helped to bring on the depression. The corporation discounts the notes, chattel mortgages, or conditional sales agreements for the manufacturers. The corporation is financed with Government funds, and the Government must take the loss of all unpaid installments. The invested capital of the corporation is $1,000,000, made available from emergency relief funds, and a credit of $10,000,000 has been set up by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for its use.

That is "some" corporation as we know corporations in this country. I know that in my own State we should regard that as a very great corporation; but, of course, this Gargantuan enterprise regards that as a very insignificant and commonplace thing—a corporation with a capitalization of $1,000,000 and an authorized borrowing power of $10,000,000. What earthly hope is there for private enterprise, or the capital of private individuals, brought together with great pains, representing in most instances the sweat of the brow and a few dollars a month put into the savings bank, and many, many accounts of this kind put together, representing the toil of John Citizen, representing his thrift, his disposition to be economical and to save money, his willingness to work, his desire for freedom and the right to work unmolested, unlimited by his Government at Washington?

What hope is there for him? What hope is there for any aggregation of citizens who pool their brains and their muscles and their sacrifices in order to serve the people, in the hope that they will have those rewards which a just society has always granted, namely, a financial profit for both the capital that works and the laborer who works? What chance is there for them if they must compete with a corporation of that kind which, with a capital of a million dollars only, can have from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation a credit of $10,000,000?

I might call the attention of Senators further to this corporation. Mind you, Mr. President, I am not undertaking to name all the important facts concerning which we will find evidence in the record about to be printed, and which should be available to us before we proceed with the consideration of this bill. These matters are brought to the attention of the Senate in order to convince it that this is indeed a very important amendment, concerning which we should have the facts before we proceed.

I call attention to one other of these outside and collateral activities to which this great corporation, the Tennessee Valley Authority, bears the relation, perhaps, of father. I do not know when we may hear the Senator from Nebraska talking about grandfather, great-grandfather, great-great-grandfather, and all the grandchildren and great-grandchildren and great-great-grandchildren of the T. V. A. Who knows? If in 2 years there can be produced such a family of corporations as this, who knows what the number will be in the near future?

The Authority has also organized a corporation under the laws of the State of Tennessee known as the "Tennessee Valley Associated Cooperatives, Inc.", the invested capital of which—$300,000—was contributed by the Emergency Relief Administration. The salary of the administrator is $6,800 per year. The annual report of the Authority refers to their activities as members of this corporation as follows:

The activities of this Corporation were designed primarily to improve the winter diet of as many persons in need of relief as possible. The prevalence of tuberculosis and pellagra showed the necessity for a more correct diet, particularly the use of more green vegetables and dairy products. The cooperative project aided during the initial period, therefore, included 1 cannery, 2 existing canneries, and a creamery. A regional farmers' cooperative was established in a group of four western North Carolina counties to promote the development and marketing of crops especially suited to the high altitudes of these counties, and began activities with the production of certified seed potatoes for the lowland market. Studies are under way of the possibilities of cooperatives as a way to increase the degree of economic self-support of the region.

Mr. President, did you ever see put together in one paragraph such a succotash of purposes as that? However much we may be interested, as the Congress of the United States, in the relief of the poor—as we have proved we are—the question before us is whether we shall proceed with the consideration of an amendment to an act which has been so maltreated by those who are the trustees of the faith of Congress as to go outside the purposes of the act and to engage in relief, as shown in that statement. The statement itself is a quotation from the report of the board of directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority, a corporation which has gone outside and engaged in cooperative farm projects; not only cooperation in seeding the ground, in raising the crop, in producing cattle, horses, sheep, dairy products, and such things, but cooperation in the difficult and, from an economic point of view, hazardous field of marketing farm products.

Let me ask, Mr. President, is there any relationship between marketing farm products and the production of electrical energy?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield for a question. I am speaking under a rule which will not permit me to yield except for a question.

Mr. COPELAND. Then, I will not ask the Senator to yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am willing to have the Senator proceed if the Senator from Nebraska is willing.

Mr. COPELAND. I will confer with the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator from Vermont propounding a question to me?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I stated a fact to the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator has any question to propound to me, I am ready to answer him if I can.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum, without his losing the floor?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BARBOUR. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Brown	Copeland	Glass
Ashurst	Bulkley	Costigan	Gore
Austin	Bulow	Couzens	Guffey
Bachman	Burke	Dickinson	Hale
Bailey	Byrd	Dieterich	Harrison
Bankhead	Byrnes	Donahey	Hastings
Barbour	Capper	Duffy	Hatch
Barkley	Caraway	Fletcher	Hayden
Bilbo	Carey	Frazier	Johnson
Black	Clark	George	Keyes
Bone	Connally	Gerry	King
Borah	Coolidge	Gibson	La Follette

Lewis	Minton	Robinson	Trammell
Logan	Moore	Russell	Truman
Loneragan	Murphy	Schall	Tydings
Long	Murray	Schwellenbach	Vandenberg
McAdoo	Neely	Sheppard	Van Nuys
McCarran	Norris	Shipstead	Wagner
McGill	O'Mahoney	Smith	Walsh
McKellar	Overton	Stelwer	Wheeler
McNary	Pittman	Thomas, Okla.	White
Maloney	Pope	Thomas, Utah
Metcalf	Radcliffe	Townsend

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the transaction of the business of the roll call set aside the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; it does not.

Mr. AUSTIN. At the time the roll call was ordered I was calling attention to one of the children of the Tennessee Valley Authority, known as "the Tennessee Valley Association Cooperatives", and to the great variety of activities of that corporation, of such a character as to cause citizens of the United States to blush with shame at the consciousness that their Government is undertaking them under the pretext that the Federal Constitution permits them.

Let me call attention in detail to these activities, as represented by the amount of money involved in them. Of course, this would be regarded as a very small corporation, having a capital of only $300,000, and I have already shown that it obtained that capital from F. E. R. A. funds. Let us see what became of those funds. Those funds were allotted to various activities, and allotted without security; and, of course, if there is any promise to pay, it probably is an implied promise, and nothing more.

Dairy and poultry, $20,000.

Think of the United States of America engaged in raising cattle and poultry. Taken on its face, and considered alone and independently and coldly, right out in the open, I venture to say there is not a single citizen of the United States who would consider that we had any right or authority, as a Federal Government, to take the taxpayers' money through a devious course—that is, through a pretense of Federal emergency relief—bestow it on a private corporation, and engage in the business of raising cattle and chickens; but that is what we are doing.

Seed potatoes: That interests the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], for here is Uncle Sam getting squarely into competition with a basic industry of the northeastern section of the United States, which has fared very poorly during the past few years, and which last year found its crop backed up upon it at prices which would not pay for one-half the cost per bushel of raising and harvesting. Yet Uncle Sam, in the name of relief, engages in competition with its citizen who raises seed potatoes. Of course, he does it in a devious way. That helps to fool somebody. He goes around through F. E. R. A. and Tennessee Valley Associated Cooperatives, Inc., and by that means allots $20,000 to people in the Carolinas to raise seed potatoes.

Here is the milling business. Who ever thought Uncle Sam would be engaged in competition with the millers of his country? Yet we find here:

Newport Flour Mill, $15,000.
Farmers Federated Knitting project, $7,500.

So we are knitting things.

Murphy Cannery Association, $6,000.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield for a question.

Mr. BARBOUR. Does the Senator know what character of knitting undertaking this is?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am glad that question has been asked, because I have reason to believe that when the evidence before the committee is published we shall find there the answer to the Senator's question; and if we should not find it there we can ascertain through a standing committee of the Senate if this bill is given the fair opportunity which important legislation ought to have in every and all cases.

I am glad the Senator asked the question, because it makes perfectly obvious one of the reasons why we should not give this bill a particular right-of-way, and special and different consideration than is accorded other important legislation. It brings out into bold relief the importance of our denying consideration to this measure until it shall have been referred to the appropriate committee, the Committee on Military Affairs. If I do not change my mind before the opportunity is offered, I believe I shall, when and if the occasion arises, move to commit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, so that a committee of this body may investigate the situation, may investigate the bill, and report to the Senate before we proceed to consider a report which states that "none of the amendments are of very great importance."

Proceeding with the varied and colorful businesses engaged in by the United States through the Tennessee Valley Authority, we come to Haywood County Cannery Association, $7,500; next, Farmers Confederated Cannery, Hendersonville, $6,000; Norris Town Stores Consumers' Corporation, $10,000; Shady Grove Cannery, $2,500. Thus we have all of these diverse activities summed up at a cost in money to the taxpayers of $94,500.

Mr. President, I invite attention to the following, which I believe will appear in the evidence if we ever have an opportunity to study it:

Arthur T. Jackson is a paid executive of the Authority and serves the association as administrator, together with assistants in his office whose salaries are also paid under the Tennessee Valley Authority appropriation. The administrative expenses of the association approximate $90,000 per annum, based on June 1934, during which month there was expended approximately $7,400, of which $6,400 was for salaries and travel, and about $1,000 for material and supplies, which have been accounted for and capitalized on the records of the Tennessee Valley Authority as "regional development."

The minutes of Tennessee Valley Authority record approval by the Board of continued payment of salary and expenses of Arthur T. Jackson, administrator of association, and his force, from the Tennessee Valley Authority funds.

There is an example of what has been characterized by the Comptroller General as dual payments to one officer.

Mr. President, the building of the town of Norris is another illustration of the manner in which a huge amount of money is being expended and how little attention is being given to estimating costs and adhering to costs. Of course in the handling of public funds, the money of the taxpayers, the people supposed they had safeguards, supposed their Constitution required that no money should be removed from the Treasury without an appropriation made by the Federal Congress, and that that meant they should know in advance that any money which would be assessed on them as a tax, whether it came immediately and directly as a tax through the course of a bond issue, should be earmarked in advance. Experience has led the Government to adopt a method of further earmarking funds in advance by a budgeting plan and system. But does Tennessee Valley Authority have to submit itself to any such ignominious thing as having its funds earmarked in advance and being required to adhere to a budget? Let us see. Certainly it is not done in the manner that other taxes of the people are earmarked and limited. But do they in any way attempt to protect the people by advance earmarking?

Mr. President, I want it understood that I am reading a quotation from the report of the Tennessee Valley Authority, as follows:

The camp and town were originally planned to cost about $2,000,000 and to include dormitories for 700 men, cottages for 250 families, buildings for the operation of a training program for workmen, community buildings, and other necessary incidental facilities.

Prices of materials and prevailing rates of wages advanced sharply while the town was under construction, and the construction schedule of the dam was advanced, requiring more housing both in dormitories and dwellings. It appeared at the end of the fiscal year that the total cost of the camp and town, including all overhead, would be about $3,500,000.

Speaking of the first group of houses the report says:

Experience in the construction of these houses indicated costs considerably in excess of estimates, due to advancing material prices, wage rates, and the pressure for rapid completion. The direct cost of construction for labor and material averaged about $5,200 per house, including direct cost in connection with electrical heating and major electrical equipment of about $750. All overhead items will eventually be allocated, and the basis of allocation to be used is being studied. In view of the depression level of rents in surrounding areas, monthly rents were set initially to average about $31 per house.

In other words, we find that the building of the town of Norris actually cost 75 percent in excess of its estimated cost; that rentals were based on depression levels in surrounding areas, and not on the cost of construction or on a reasonable charge for the accommodations provided; and the Authority states that the basis of allocation of overhead "is being studied."

Mr. President, before taking my seat I am very anxious to have the RECORD contain a sufficient specification of the shocking misuse of the powers granted by the original T. V. A. Act, to cause the Senate to pause before entering upon the consideration of an amendment which would increase those powers, broaden the authority, and extend the scope of that act, and double the amount of money involved, to pause long enough either to investigate the facts by a standing committee of its own, or to have the advantage of the investigation by a standing committee of the House.

As hearing upon what is likely to be disclosed by such an investigation, consider the carelessness, the violation of law, the breach of absolute statutory provisions in the handling of these funds in the particular to which I am about to refer. I mention something that is found in the report of the Comptroller General. Listed among other items are overpayments on salary to members of the Tennessee Valley Authority Board as follows:

A. E. Morgan, $1,124.97.

H. A. Morgan, $1,124.97.

D. E. Lilienthal, $1,091.61.

Mr. President, if those three men, who constitute in a sense, the trustees of the fidelity of the Congress of the United States—those three men, who are the directors of the T. V. A.—have so little regard for punctiliousness in handling other people's money, that they may take to themselves, for their own use, excessive overpayments or any overpayments of their salaries, what do you say as to whether the Senate should approve a motion to proceed with the consideration of an amendment which will increase their powers, and increase the amount of money of which they will have the custody, and in handling which they should be faithful to the last cent?

Did Congress intend that the taxes of the American people should be expended by these men for the perpetuation of their figures in history? Was that included in the scope of the T. V. A.? Was it intended that any part of that $50,000,000 should be spent for photographs of these men? This audit, at page 287, shows various expenditures of Government funds for other than official business, included in which are items aggregating $31.65 for photographic prints of Arthur E. Morgan and D. E. Lilienthal. Was that Government business?

It makes very little difference to me whether the amount is $31 or $31,000 as bearing upon the pending question. We are now asked to proceed to the consideration of an amendment of the T. V. A. Act which will increase the amount of money of which these men shall have the custody, and in the expenditure of which they should be faithful. I say before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the kind of amendment proposed that we should have an investigation of these men and of their conduct. At least we should have the benefit of such investigation as has been made by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives. If we cannot, as Senators of the United States of America, pause long enough before taking up this bill to consider those things, what account shall we render to the people for fidelity?

Mr. President, I am informed and I believe that the evidence will show that the statutes requiring the letting of contracts by bids and not by negotiation have been persistently, almost in every case, violated, and that the evidence will tend to show that such violations resulted in damage and injury to the United States.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield for a question.

Mr. GORE. I desire to ask to have an insertion made in the RECORD.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should be very glad to yield, but the Senator from Nebraska obtained a ruling of the Chair that the Senator from Vermont could not yield, without losing the floor, for any other purpose than the asking of a question. I regret that that is the situation.

Mr. GORE. I appreciate the situation. I was not aware that that was the parliamentary status. I will say to the Senator that the portion of his speech I have heard has been well worth hearing, and I am glad to know the Senator is not to be interrupted.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma. I have only begun what I wish to say, and I should like to fortify the suggestion I have last made with respect to the misuse of power by the Tennessee Valley associates in the manner to which I have alluded.

Mr. President, on November 18, 1933, a cost-plus contract of 8 percent was given to the Stone & Webster Engineering Corporation for work in connection with electric and blast furnaces for phosphoric acid. I call attention to the estimated cost of this work as bearing upon a point which I have already made; that when unlimited authority such as this is delegated, it will certainly be used; and we find the transactions carried on subject to the infirmities that are well known among mankind, which infirmities have required the use of devices to protect the public and the Treasury of the Public from their effect.

I call particular attention to the estimated cost of this work, which was $615,000, and on which the company had been paid $89,586.22 up to June 20, 1934. I shall recur to that figure later. It is a very significant figure as bearing upon the pending question.

The Comptroller General, in his audit, said about this matter:

No evidence was available at the Knoxville office showing that invitations for bids were solicited but, on the contrary, the contract was entered into with Stone & Webster on the basis of cost plus 8 percent, the estimated cost to amount to $615,000. The contractor was to design, construct, or supervise the construction of all work covered therein. The contract provided that payment of the 8-percent fee should be made by paying $20,000 in five monthly payments of $4,000 each, beginning December 31, 1933, the total compensation not to exceed $48,600.

I know that it is difficult to carry figures in memory, so I am going to recur to that figure of $89,586.22 and compare it with $48,600, because that comparison speaks of the carelessness, the improvidence, the lack of business sense and the violation of the statutes of the United States.

It was represented to the Board that if the work is all done on a cost-plus basis the whole program would be under the control of the Authority. However, an audit conducted by the Authority of the books of account of the Stone & Webster Engineering Corporation at nitrate plant no. 2 disclosed charges of $108,536.05 against the contract through April 1934, and it was stated that this cost would be further augmented by items used by Stone & Webster from the Authority storehouse which were not taken up on the contractor's books.

The Comptroller General further discloses that although the Stone & Webster Co. were to receive a total of $48,600, the records show that at the period indicated, when the work was about one-sixth progressed, they had been paid $89,586.22.

Now I call attention to something very small, but very significant, something which should excite us to refuse to assent to the pending motion.

The Comptroller details an excess payment of $355.57 on a purchase of various items of desks from the Roberts Co.

The bid prices and the prices paid by groups are as follows: Sixty-eight desks; bid price, each $24. Does the Senate understand that that is the bid price, that the desks could have been had, by mere acceptance of the bid, by the Government paying $24 only? Of course, the Senate understands that. But they paid for those 68 desks $26.95 each.

Here is another item, of 20 desks, bid price, $29 each; amount paid for each desk, $31.95.

Another item: 35 desks, bid price, each, $34; amount paid for each, $36.95.

Should we not pause a little before we give men twice as much money to squander in that manner as they had when they misused their power in this way?

I think we should at least consider the evidence before we adopt an amendment which increases their power and increases the amount of money they have to expend.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think I should advise the Senator that I asked him to yield for the purpose of stating that it is my intention to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and, at the conclusion thereof, that the Senate take a recess.

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield if by so doing I do not lose the floor.

WILLIAM KEMPER

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 282) for the relief of William Kemper, which were, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "$600" and insert "$891.98", and on the same page, line 9, after the figures "1932" to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. BULKLEY. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably the following nominations:

Alvin Mansfield Owsley, of Texas, now Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Rumania, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Irish Free State;

Leland Harrison, of Illinois, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Rumania; and John R. Putnam, of Oregon, now a Foreign Service officer of class 3 and a consul, to be a consul general of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

He also, from the same committee, reported adversely the nomination of George W. Carrier to be postmaster at New-castle, Ind., in place of S. J. Bufkin, resigned.

Mr. TRAMMELL, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Maj. John M. Arthur to be a lieutenant colonel in the Marine Corps from May 1, 1935, and also the nominations of several other officers in the Marine Corps.

He also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers in the Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Armond W. Scott to be judge of the municipal court of the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in legislative session, took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, May 9, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 8 (legislative day of May 7), 1935

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 8, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Wait thou on God. Heavenly Father, in Thy holy presence may we have thoughts and feelings which are not inspired by false haste; let spirits be hushed and subdued as we linger in composure and tranquillity. With great peace bless us with a wonderful detachment from undue care and worry. Enable us to preserve our hidden and spiritual power; may it be renewed, sustained, and nourished. In the school of public service let us most assuredly pass from stage to stage, having expanding visions of our Republic and a growing realization of the essential need of a firm faith in the God of our fathers. With eagerness and with glad contemplation send us forth to the fields of duty, having energy with sight, force with a song, and a jubilant march of strength. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 273. Joint resolution extending the gratitude of the Nation to Admiral Byrd and to the members of his expedition; and

H. J. Res. 274. Joint resolution authorizing the appointment of a special joint committee to meet with other representatives of the Government in greeting Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd upon his return from his second Antarctic expedition.

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION IN MEXICO

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Mexico and Catholic persecution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, is this document attacking the present Government of Mexico?

Mr. CELLER. It is.

Mr. BLANTON. I think it is untimely for a Member of the House to print documents attacking a sovereign government that is our close neighbor and our friend. My district, when I first came here, joined several hundred miles of Mexican territory.

Mr. CELLER. Does the gentleman object to my own remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I do not object to the remarks of any Member, but I do object to outsiders' documents attacking Mexico. I think we ought to keep peace with Mexico.

Mr. O'CONNOR demanded the regular order.

Mr. CELLER. These are my own remarks.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand these were the gentleman's own remarks. I have no objection to Members' own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my answer to remarks of Hon. Eduardo Villaseñor, consul general of Mexico, at New York, May 5, 1935:

The present persecution of Catholics on our own continent—in Mexico—dismays and frightens all liberty-loving citizens. This reversion to medieval methods is most discouraging. To Americans, intolerance of any variety is especially obnoxious. Complete personal freedom in all phases of our daily lives is an integral part of the American birthright, and it is, therefore, with actual horror that we witness the present Mexican scene.

It is well to recall the famous reply of George Washington to the parishioners of the Portuguese Synagogue at Newport, R. I., which in 1789, had congratulated General Washington upon his elevation to the Presidency. Washington states that he now rejoiced that every man could worship his God under his own vine and fig tree, and there shall be none to make him afraid—there shall be none to make him afraid.

It is refreshing also to note that when Thomas Jefferson wrote his own epitaph, which is found upon the base of the monument erected to his memory at the portals of the University of Virginia, he was insistent upon including therein the fact that he was the author of the Virginia statute of religious freedom.

And when the Constitution was ratified, it is well to recall that Jefferson opposed it because it failed to contain a bill of rights, including religious freedom. He labored incessantly until the nine first amendments including the amendment concerning religious freedom were embedded in the Constitution.

On March 31, 1935, Dr. Luis Quintanilla, counselor of the Mexican Embassy, Washington, said: "Religious liberty was one of the fundamental features of American life. It undoubtedly contributed to the amazing growth of your great country."

What a far cry it is from Jefferson, Washington, and Quintanilla, how contrary to the spirit of our institutions and government is the Catholic persecution now rampant in Mexico.

It might be asked what concern is it of ours? Why should we not be a good neighbor and disregard what is happening below the Rio Grande? To apply this policy of good neighborliness is, as was said by Archbishop Curley, like trying to be a good neighbor to a man living next door who comes home drunk, beats his wife, keeps his children in rags, and sometimes throws them out of the window.

To vary the simile, if my neighbor's house is on fire, I must take the uttermost precautions to see to it that the conflagration doesn't spread to mine.

Religious liberty is too infinitely valuable to us to allow it to be impinged upon at so close a range.

Make no mistake about this: Catholic persecution is official in Mexico. For example, Prof. Raymond V. Moley reports that on the wall in the reception room of Tomas Garrido Canabal, Minister of Agriculture and leader of the Government's antireligious campaign, hangs a placard bearing this inscription: "Belief in God has been the cause of the oppression and backwardness of the people."

The fact that the rulers of Mexico, the National Revolutionary Party, may be themselves antireligious is no concern of ours. But when these rulers attempt to stamp out and crush the religious freedom of their compatriots, the entire aspect changes, and we can regard such a policy as a definite threat to the security of our own freedom.

The Mexican foreign service emphatically denies that there is even any attempt to persecute Catholics. It claims that if there is any misfortune, if there is any difficulty, it is due to the Catholic Church and the Catholic Hierarchy. Any complaints lodged against them are foreign fictions and propaganda against the National Revolutionary Government. This identical method is being used by Hitler in Germany in a similar campaign against the Jews. In fact, the denial by the Mexican authorities of Catholic persecution is so palpably weak that I cannot resist the temptation of repeating the story that emanates from Germany. A family of Jews in Germany wrote to relatives in the United States as follows:

"We have a wonderful life. Not a hair on the head of any Jew has been touched, and Hitler is bringing us to a better future."

"Uncle Morritz, who expressed the opposite opinion, is being buried tomorrow."

It is so easy to deny. It is so easy to charge propaganda.

Let us look into the record. The Living Church, the organ of the Anglican Episcopalian Church in America, several months ago declared that the hatred of those in control of the Mexican Government for religion of any sort, Catholic or Protestant, has been increasingly manifest during the past decade. It speaks of a Mexican governmental body blow to Christianity.

Many other responsible representative journals of religious opinion in this country have unanimously condemned the Mexican situation as a major scandal in world affairs. Amongst these are the Christian Century, the Christian Science Monitor, the American Hebrew, as well as leading publications of the Baptist, Presbyterian, and Methodist faiths.

Many resolutions of inquiry, many resolutions of condemnation of Mexico, have been introduced in the House of Representatives and the Senate. Among them are resolutions by Senators BARBOUR, of New Jersey, BORAH, of Idaho, and WAGNER, of New York. The latter has presented resolutions demanding suspension of trade relations with Mexico and urging tourists not to visit that country because of atrocities against Catholics. Certainly these distinguished men are not fools. They are not going to be stampeded into action by mere rumors, nor are they to be influenced by self-serving declarations and propaganda of the Mexican authorities. Mexican naive denials, without proof, are as useless and ineffectual to them and to other right-thinking Americans as snow falling upon an iceberg.

Late in November of the past year, the National Conference of Jews and Christians published a statement of protest against Mexican tyranny and persecutions against Catholics, signed by 500 clergymen of the Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish faiths. Newton D. Baker, Prof. Carlton J. Hays, and Roger W. Strauss were cochairmen of the conference. Nine-tenths of the signatures were Protestant ministers and Jewish rabbis, representing 26 Protestant and 3 Jewish denominations in 41 States, and in Canada. Grave concern was expressed over the situation in Mexico, the report said, where many unprejudiced observers indicated that in the endeavor to secure social justice and political reforms otherwise desirable, religious liberty was being imperiled.

On October 19, 1934, the Mexican Chamber of Deputies voted to deport all Catholic bishops and archbishops throughout the country. Unbiased observers, returning from Mexico, report that there has been rioting and atrocities.

The Herald Tribune for Sunday, November 11, reported: "Authorities of Las Casas, in Chiapas State, gathered, last night, and burned in public all images of saints taken in raids on Roman Catholic churches. Priests in the town were recently deported to Guatemala."

Raiding by police, without warrants, of private homes where, in absolute privacy, religious devotions are being held, is a common occurrence. There are only 25 priests allotted to Mexico City to administer to 1,000,000 Catholics.

The mails are now closed to any material directed toward the diffusion of any religious creed. Not even the Bible is permitted to be circulated through the Mexican mails.

Robert Hammond Murray, resident of Mexico most of the time since 1909, newspaper correspondent and former representative in Mexico of our own Department of State, recently writing in the magazine Today, stated:

"Catholics say that their church, their religion, and their co-religionists in Mexico are being persecuted. The Mexican Government insists, with vehemence, that they are not. I say they are. I say this as a Protestant * * *"

"In 11 of the 30 States and Territories of Mexico in January of this year not a clergyman was in service, except surreptitiously, and only a handful of churches were open for worship. Every priest had been expelled from six of the States. One Territory, Lower California, was legally entitled to one priest to preach and administer the sacraments to a population of 95,000—and he had been driven out of the country.

"Only 372 priests were licensed to officiate in all Mexico, with its 18,000,000 inhabitants, or 1 to every 43,010 persons; and of these priests probably more than half were not permitted to officiate, had been terrorized into silence, or had been forced to flee the country subsequent to the recrudescence of antireligious intolerance within the past year. 'Conspiring against the Government and the revolution' is the stock charge advanced to justify the arrest and expulsion of priests."

These are not mere whimsical atrocity tales made up for the occasion, as Dr. Quintanilla charges.

George Creel, noted correspondent, in Collier's, March 16, 1935, gives evidence of ruthless persecutions against Catholics and banishment of nuns and priests and closing of churches. F. V. Williams testifies similarly in the Washington Post.

Jacques D'Armand, United Press staff correspondent, claims that one-third of Mexican States and Territories prohibit all church services. He reports that, in general, the Catholic Church has submitted to all Mexican laws while protesting against their alleged injustice.

Are these trusted writers liars and cheats? No. They are reflecting actual conditions. Naive denials are useless and ineffectual as snow falling upon an iceberg.

Incidentally the Mexican Government has set up a new diplomatic post called "attaché for propaganda." Already the Mexican Government is flooding this country with literature and pamphlets, all in the nature of defenses of the activities of the Mexican revolutionary government and in derogation of the rights of the Catholic Church. I have drawn the attention of the Postmaster General, Mr. Farley, to the fact that most of these letters and circulars, sent in our domestic mails under the diplomatic and consular "frank", are in violation of the Postal Convention between the United States and Mexico, as well as a violation of our postal laws. I warn the Mexican authorities that unless this flood of propaganda through our mails under the "frank" ceases, I shall leave no stone unturned to have the Postal Convention abrogated.

It is interesting to note that the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Sir John Simon, has promised the members of the House of Commons that he would instruct the British Minister at Mexico City to institute an inquiry as to the facilities for divine worship available to British citizens resident in Mexico—all indicative of the fact that Great Britain is gravely concerned over the antireligious attitude of the Mexican Government.

What about our own nationals resident in Mexico who are unable to attend mass and partake of the Catholic sacraments?

Answering the distinguished Mexican Consul General, Mr. Villaseñor, if the Catholic Church was at any time in the past intolerant, this should be no reason for governmental intolerance and persecution in the present. Two wrongs do not make a right.

I applaud Mexico's attempt to solve the problem of democracy. I inveigh only against its spoliation of the Catholic Church and ostracism of its adherents.

Indeed the illiberalism of the Holy Inquisition and the Conquistadors is no justification for the intolerance of the national revolutionary government.

Mr. Villaseñor cites provisions of the Mexican Constitution. He fails to cite article 24 of the 1917 constitution, which reads as follows:

"Every man is free to profess the religion of his choice and to practice the rituals, devotions, and acts of the respective creed in temples or in his home, provided they do not constitute a crime or offense punishable by law."

That provision has been flagrantly violated.

I agree with the consul general that education should be non-religious. Unfortunately, in Mexico it is antireligious.

Why were Government employees questioned as to their religious persuasions? Was that not most suspicious? Does not my adversary convict his government of the very religious intolerance he denies? What has religion of employees to do with civil service except to make them marked men?

The good consul general admits all Government employees were compelled to parade in October, as an act of "collective discipline." (Rather ominous method—sounds sinister to me.) Although most of these employees are Catholic, they were thus compelled, under penalty of dismissal, to do homage to the national revolutionary government, which has pillaged their church and hunted and hounded their prelates.

In the light of Mexican tyranny and irreligious practices, the time must, indeed, be soon at hand for the United States to indicate, officially, in no uncertain terms, that it views with grave concern this distressing situation. There is ample precedent for such an American pronouncement. We interceded in connection with the persecution of the Jews in Damascus in 1840. In 1850 President Millard Fillmore interceded to secure full religious liberty for the Jews in Switzerland. In 1853 we interceded to prevent the persecution of Christian missionaries in Greece. In 1870 Secretary of State Hamilton Fish interceded in behalf of Christian missionaries in Hawaii. In 1895 Secretary of State Olney vigorously protested the massacre of Christians at Aleppo and at other Turkish cities. In fact, we dispatched three warships by way of backing up our protest. Many similar illustrations of our diplomatic intervention can be cited, even where our nationals were not involved.

I give warning that diplomatic remonstrance will soon come unless Mexican cruelties to Catholics cease.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask on what subject the gentleman is going to talk?

Mr. EKWALL. I am going to speak on the subject of the impeachment articles that were filed here yesterday.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I think the whole proceeding yesterday was improper and the method by which we bring these things before the House is improper. I think the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee agrees with this view. To walk in here and not have courage enough to impeach a judge but just file alleged charges against him which are referred to a committee, washing all that dirty linen in public, is not the way to conduct a prosecution of this sort.

Mr. EKWALL. That is what I want to speak about.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think the whole proceeding of yesterday was an insult.

Mr. EKWALL. Does the gentleman object to my proceeding?

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman is going to attempt to cure the unseemly exhibition here yesterday, I shall not object.

Mr. EKWALL. That is what I am going to try to do.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. DUFFEY of Ohio and Mr. DIRKSEN objected.

HISTORY AND ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, having served with the United States Marines for almost 2 years during the late World War, I believe that few persons outside of the naval service have any real knowledge or appreciation of the value of the United States Marine Corps in many of the more important events which go to make up the history of our country. The idea prevailing in the minds of most of our citizens, when the marines are mentioned, is a picturesque organization of young fellows struggling through tropical jungles fighting a tatterdemalion rebel army which was on the verge of overthrowing a government that had borrowed a lot of money from Americans.

While this picture is by no means entirely erroneous, the episodes of Latin American intervention give an inadequate impression of a branch of the naval service whose importance has not met with the general recognition which it merits.

Since an organization, like an individual, cannot properly be evaluated without some comprehension of its historical background, I propose briefly to review part of the history and accomplishments of this famous military organization.

Five centuries before the Christian Era the employment of infantry as part of the regular complement of vessels of war was common to the maritime states of the Mediterranean Sea. As naval science progressed, and as the size of vessels increased, a sharp differentiation was made in the duties of the seamen, who managed the vessel, and the marines, who were the fighting men.

Great maritime powers have always found it necessary to maintain a corps of marines, and England was no exception to the rule. In the time of Queen Elizabeth, after the destruction of the Spanish Armada, England first clearly saw that her destiny was on the sea. Soon thereafter the British Corps of Marines was founded, the ancestor of our own Marine Corps, whose equally glorious traditions our corps inherited.

The United States Marine Corps is no mere modern upstart among the military and naval organizations of the United States. Its origin runs back to the earliest days of the Nation and even earlier. The first authentic record of marines in America bears the date of 1740, when the American Colonies still yielded cheerful obedience to the British Crown. At that time three regiments of American marines were raised for service in the British Navy on this side of the Atlantic.

On November 10, 1775, before a single vessel was sent to sea, the Congress passed a resolution organizing a Marine Corps of two battalions, and prescribing also the number of officers and their ranks as well as the general qualifications of the enlisted men. Not until a month later, when the Congress commissioned several small war vessels, did the American Navy have its true beginnings. Wherefore the marines find a certain proud satisfaction in pointing out that their organization antedates that of the Navy itself.

In considering this resolution of the Congress it is of interest to note that it specified that "none should be enlisted in the Marine Corps except such as were good seamen." That is a qualification long since discarded. Although at times they served ship's guns, in the old Navy of yardarm-to-yardarm conflicts their battle service was mainly to board the adversary or to repel boarders and with their muskets to keep up a continuous fire, picking off, so far as possible, conspicuous officers.

Always, the marines have been the police of the men-of-war, serving as the captains' orderlies, mounting guard, and maintaining order. The early erroneous conception of the marine as a seaman persisted until recent years and was accompanied by a curious lack of understanding of their true function and real value.

From the hour of their earliest organization the marines made a noble record for themselves and for their country, furnishing conclusive evidence of the wisdom of the legislation which called their corps into existence. In the early naval fights they played a most important part, everywhere present and everywhere doing their duty. While the records of the Revolutionary War are but scanty and fragmentary, they show the presence on the ships of the infant American Navy of a considerable body of marines, a total of about 3,000.

These marines were distributed among the ships in detachments ranging in size from a sergeant's guard of 12 or 15 men up to 60 men with 2 commissioned officers. The roll of the officers and men of the Marine Corps killed in the naval engagements of the Revolutionary War, although short, is impressive in view of the small number in the corps at that time. In the famous action between the Bon Homme Richard and the British ship Serapis 49 of John Paul Jones' marines were killed or wounded, one-third of the total number of marines in the crew.

Within a year after the founding of the corps it was engaged in a landing operation on foreign soil, an enterprise which foreshadowed a multitude of similar operations in the years which followed.

An American naval squadron of eight vessels, under Commodore Esek Hopkins, proceeded to a rendezvous in the Bahamas in 1776. There Commodore Hopkins determined to make a descent upon New Brunswick, a British naval base, in an effort to capture military stores. A battalion of 300 marines in small boats landed under cover of the fire from the warships Providence and Wasp, which had been sent in to cover the landing.

The marines captured the forts by assault, together with a hundred cannon, a large quantity of stores, the Governor, and a number of prominent citizens. The official report of the action stated that "the marines behaved with spirit and steadiness."

This early amphibious operation against a naval base is of particular interest in that it embodied so many points of general similarity to the present-day methods of conducting operations from the sea against fortified bases ashore.

At the conclusion of the Revolutionary War the Navy, and with it the Marine Corps, was disbanded in accordance with the theory that in time of peace we need not prepare for war.

In 1798, as a result of the hostile actions of French ships against American merchant vessels and the impressment of American sailors by the French, the Navy Department was formally organized and a Secretary of the Navy was appointed. Previously naval activities had come under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War. A few months later, in the same year, a law was passed authorizing a permanent Marine Corps.

During the hostilities which were conducted between the United States and France for more than 2 years without a declaration of war, 84 French ships were captured and the Marines took part in practically all of these naval actions. In the battle between the American ship Constellation and the French ship La Vengeance, one-eighth of the Constellation's crew of 310 were killed, of whom more than one-fourth were marines.

In the War of 1812 marines fought in nearly every engagement, afloat and ashore, invariably suffering heavy casualties. The sea fights in which they took part are among the most glorious incidents of American history—the Constitution and the Guerriere, the United States and the Macedonian, the Wasp and the Frolic, the Constitution and the Java, the Hornet and the Peacock, the Shannon and the Chesapeake, the Enterprise and the Boxer, the Battle of Lake Ontario, the Battle of Lake Erie, the Battle of Lake Champlain, the Constitution and the Cyane, the Hornet and the Penguin.

As for the operations on land, the marines and sailors played a creditable part in the Battle of Bladensburg, which preceded the burning of Washington, and were the only troops that stood their ground when the militia fled, until the British turned their rear. One-third of the marines at Bladensburg were casualties.

Detachments of marines served with the Army and were commended for their services at the Battle of Fort Mifflin in Baltimore and at the Battle of New Orleans under Gen. Andrew Jackson.

The service of the Marine Corps during the Mexican War was one both of quality and quantity. Members of the corps served in detachments afloat in the Gulf Squadron, in the Pacific Squadron, and ashore as part of the Army under General Scott. From their participation in the assault on Chapultepec came the inspiration for the initial lines of their famous hymn, the Halls of Montezuma.

After the Mexican War the Government largely reduced the armed forces, and the Marine Corps suffered with the rest. But the service of the corps was not unappreciated. In 1859 the Secretary of the Navy said:

The Marine Corps is an indispensable branch of the naval service. At home we have had occasion to appreciate its prompt and disciplined energy in maintaining law, order, and government against outbreaks of illegal violence. It is a gallant little band upon which rest the most widely extended duties at home and in every sea and clime, without sufficient numbers to perform them.

The services of the marines in the Civil War were rendered "nobly and well" afloat and "admirably in camp and field." The Marine Corps, for the most part, serve afloat with the Navy, participating in the exhausting labors of blockade and assisting the Army in attacks on fortifications along the rivers and the seacoast. The services of the Navy and Marine Corps in the Civil War, although less spectacular and attracting less attention than those of the Army, were no less arduous and contributed in equal measure to the final success of the Federal arms.

In the latter half of the nineteenth century and early years of the twentieth century Central and South America and Cuba were particularly active in giving military employment to the Marine Corps. Turbulence, insurrection, revolution, and disorder have necessitated intervention by American arms on numerous occasions. Filibustering expeditions and gun running by American citizens were suppressed by the marines with a heavy hand, and numerous landings were made on foreign soil to quell riotous outbreaks.

The Marine Corps has fallen heir to this kind of duty, because international law permits such forces to be landed on foreign soil without the necessary existence of a state of war. American marines have been landed 72 times on foreign soil during the past 50 years.

The list of foreign countries where such wars, military occupations, and expeditions were participated in by the Marine Corps reads like a gazetteer of romance. This list, even though not complete, is so impressive in its implications of the world-wide scope of positive American diplomatic activity during the past century, that I cannot refrain from reading it. It is as follows:

China, Japan, Siberia, Korea, Formosa, Philippines, Sumatra, Samoa, Fiji Islands, Drummond Islands, Navassa Islands, Hawaiian Islands, Nicaragua, Honduras, Colombia, Argentina, Chile, Panama, Mexico, Cuba, Bahamas, Haiti, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Tripoli, Abyssinia, Syria, Russia, France, and Germany.

There have been several interesting occasions where marines assisted in suppressing domestic disturbances. In 1857 the famous Washington riot took place here in the District of Columbia, the story of which is an echo from a dead political past. The so-called "Know-Nothing" Party imported a gang of hired ruffians, armed with clubs and revolvers, to take possession of the polls, and terrorize the citizens, preventing them from voting. The murderous crowd rushed the police who, although they fought valiantly, were driven from the polls. Thereupon the mayor called upon the President of the United States for assistance, and two companies of marines were ordered out of the Washington Navy Yard. Proceeding to the polls, surrounded by a threatening crowd of rioters, and amid the reckless firing of revolvers by the crowd, the marines suppressed the disorder, firing only a single volley.

Another interesting domestic disorder in which the marines participated was at Harpers Ferry, Va., where 40 marines from Washington under command of Col. Robert E. Lee, of the United States Army, stormed the fire-engine house to arrest John Brown, the abolitionist, and his band of followers.

During the draft riots in New York City in 1863 a battalion of marines patrolled the city for a week, making arrests and guarding public buildings, quelling by force of arms the strong resistance to the draft being made by lawless elements.

In times of public calamity also, as during the earthquakes at San Francisco in 1906, at Messina, Italy, in 1908, and in Long Beach, Calif., in 1933, the Marines have proved their worth in saving life, in guarding public and private property, and by assisting the citizens in every possible manner.

The present Italian difficulties with Abyssinia recall a picturesque expedition made by a body of 18 marines to the then-unknown town of Addis Ababa in Abyssinia. The State Department desired to negotiate a treaty with King Menelik and asked for an escort to convoy a diplomatic agent to the monarch's court. Landing at Somaliland, the party proceeded by means of camels and mules across a desert and over a mountain range, successfully accomplishing their mission.

In 1916 the population of Santo Domingo was in bloody revolution and a considerable expedition was sent in, which gradually placed the principal ports of the island under American control. The people fought savagely. A regiment of marines marching some 75 miles inland to Santiago had to fight every step of the way, finding all bridges destroyed and the roads blocked by the retreating natives. Not until the revolutionists laid down their arms and agreed to the formation of a provisional government under the auspices of the Marine Corps were hostilities ended.

The problems which confronted the marines in Haiti were much the same as those in Santo Domingo. There, too, native politicians sought to carry elections by force or by assassinations. In policing Haiti the marines were in constant danger of murderous and treacherous attack. Not infrequently a few men would be established at some outpost and would have to beat off great mobs of natives who thought to rush them and overwhelm them by numbers.

When peaceful conditions were again established the marines devoted their attention and energies to peaceful undertakings. In Santo Domingo and the adjoining Republic of Haiti they demonstrated that a body of men trained primarily for fighting purposes and acknowledged to be at the head of the military profession could adapt themselves to the task of restoring peaceful institutions and bringing order out of chaos.

They established sanitary and hygienic regulations, so necessary in the Tropics, and enforced them. Wagon tracks were developed into real roads, telephone and telegraph wires were strung, and their proper management was taught to the natives. Railroads were put in order and maintained schedules. Schools were opened and children compelled to attend them, while parents were taught to keep themselves and their offspring reasonably clean. Wandering bands of brigands were suppressed and property protected. Customs were collected and used for the benefit of the people or the foreign creditors of the country. Finances were put in order, while trade and industry took on new life. The marines were leaders in all this work, acting not merely as policemen but as guides, philosophers, and friends of the people.

When the United States entered the World War on April 6, 1917, the strength of the Marine Corps was nearly 14,000 officers and men. When the war ended the corps had been expanded to five and one-half times that number, to an actual strength of 75,000. Despite this great expansion, the high standard of the corps was never lowered. Within 1 year after the outbreak of the war the Marine Corps placed as many troops in France as there were in the entire corps when war was declared. Before the war ended 30,000 marines were sent overseas to join the American Expeditionary Forces.

Although upon the outbreak of the war slightly more than half of the total number of officers and men were on duty beyond the continental limits of the United States and serving on board cruising vessels of the Navy, only 5 weeks later the fifth regiment of marines, 70 officers and 2,689 enlisted men, one-sixth of the entire corps, organized, equipped, and ready for active service sailed for France, forming one-fifth of the first expedition of American troops; a remarkable demonstration of readiness and efficiency.

Soon afterward this regiment was joined by the Sixth Regiment of Marines and the Sixth Machine Gun Battalion, the whole being organized into the Fourth Marine Brigade. As one of the brigades of the Second Division, this famous brigade engaged in battle in no less than eight distinct operations in France, suffering approximately 12,000 casualties, of which nearly 3,000 died on the battlefield.

Notwithstanding its splendid contribution to the success of American arms in France, the Marine Corps performed the naval duties required of it in a highly satisfactory manner. No call was made for additional marines for naval purposes that was not fully met, and this is of especial interest, as the Marine Corps is essentially a part of the Naval Establishment, and its first duty is to fill all naval needs and requirements.

In this connection I desire to quote from a report of the House Committee on Naval Affairs in the Thirty-ninth Congress:

From the establishment of the Marine Corps to the present time it has constituted an integral part of the Navy, has been identified with it in all its achievements, ashore and afloat, and has continued to receive from its most distinguished commanders the expression of their appreciation of the effectiveness as a part of the Navy.

Like every other part of the Navy, the Marine Corps exists for the fleet. While amphibious operations have not been of frequent occurrence in recent years, it is believed that such operations involving the seizure or defense of outlying naval bases will be part of the task of the American Navy in any future war in which we may be engaged.

With this in mind the Marine Corps has organized and now keeps in readiness a highly trained and very mobile fleet marine force composed of infantry, artillery, aviation, and auxiliary troops on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. This force conducts frequent exercises with the fleet on both coasts and in the West Indies. Officers and men must be accustomed to the conditions which will confront them while afloat, and it is essential that their training differ from that of either sailors or soldiers.

In addition to the fleet Marine force the Marine Corps maintains its time-honored garrisons at navy yards and naval stations within and without the United States, as well as detachments on board men-of-war. A regiment of marines is stationed in the troubled area at Shanghai, China, while a marine guard protects our legation at Peiping.

In every corner of the world these faithful men well sustain the high reputation for steadfast courage and unsullied honor handed down to them by their predecessors. The ancient marine tradition of duty and self-sacrifice is a noble heritage, and it has been nobly maintained. For 160 years, ashore and afloat, in war and in peace, on every continent and on every sea their stubborn loyalty and devotion to duty have added glory to their country's history and luster to their corps.

RELIEF IN OKLAHOMA

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Oregon, I believe, asked unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. An objection was made, but was later withdrawn, so that I understand that his request is before the House at the present time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the request made by the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. KENNEY. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, for the last 3 months I have been calling the attention of this body to the dust storms in western Oklahoma, Kansas, Colorado, New Mexico, and Texas. I have exhausted the resources of aid and relief for those people by contacting every department that I thought might be of some help and might be able to meet the situation. Since I have had this experience I have drawn a bill that I introduced yesterday, and at this point, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the bill inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The bill referred to is as follows:

House Joint Resolution 275

Joint resolution making appropriations for emergency relief in stricken agricultural areas

Resolved, etc., That the Congress hereby declares that there exists an acute emergency and an urgent necessity for relief in agricultural areas stricken by severe drought, dust storms, and crop failures; that the urgency is at the present time greatest in the States of Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, Colorado, and New Mexico, within which States the drought and dust storms are most severe, and from which dust storms pass to other States; that in the designated States there is an existing or threatened deprivation of a considerable number of families and individuals of the necessities of life; and that it is imperative that the farm operators in the stricken areas be furnished relief and be assisted to modify their land-use practices so as to lessen the likelihood of recurrence of similar dust storms.

SEC. 2. In order to meet the said emergency and necessity for relief, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to remain available until June 30, 1937, the sum of $50,000,000 to be used in the discretion and under the direction of the President, in the stricken areas of the said States and in any other States in which the President may find and declare that the emergency and necessity for relief from drought, dust storms, and crop failures has become aggravated, for: (1) Furnishing relief in the form of money, services, materials, and/or commodities to provide the necessities of life, including hospitalization and medical care, to persons in need; (2) making loans and grants for, and/or the purchase, sale, gift, or other disposition of, seed, feed, livestock, farm implements, and machinery, freight, soil preparation, summer fallowing, and similar purposes; (3) making loans and grants for the making of needed repairs to farm buildings and farm machinery; and (4) making loans and grants for the performance of such work and the carrying out of such engineering operations, methods of cultivation, growing of vegetation, changes in use of land, and such other measures as are necessary to conserve soil resources and to prevent soil blowing. The provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5) shall not apply to any purchase made or service procured in carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution when the aggregate amount involved is less than $500.

SEC. 3. As a condition to the extending of any benefits or assistance under this act, the President may require agreements or covenants on the part of the owners and/or occupiers of lands upon which any work is to be done under the provisions hereof, as to the permanent use of such lands, to the end that improper land-use practices contributing to soil blowing and soil erosion may be discontinued, and appropriate soil-conserving land-use practices, cropping programs, and tillage practices may be employed.

SEC. 4. In carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution, the President is authorized to—

(a) Utilize and prescribe the duties and functions of the Soil Conservation Service of the Department of Agriculture, the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, the Farm Credit Administration, or other agencies within the Government, and to delegate to such agencies powers herein conferred;

(b) Authorize expenditures for supplies and equipment; travel expenses; rental at the seat of government and elsewhere; purchase, operation, and maintenance of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles; printing and binding; and such other expenses as he may determine necessary to the accomplishment of the objectives of this joint resolution;

(c) Perform such acts and prescribe such regulations as he may deem proper to carry out the provisions of this joint resolution.

SEC. 5. If during the present drought and dust-storm emergency, a carrier subject to the Interstate Commerce Act shall, at the request of any agent of the United States authorized so to do, establish special rates for the benefit of drought and dust-storm sufferers, such a carrier shall not be deemed to have violated the Interstate Commerce Act with reference to undue preference or unjust discrimination by reason of the fact that it applies such special rates only to those designated as drought and dust-storm sufferers by the authorized agents of the United States or of any State.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, to substantiate the proof that the present organizations are not meeting the existing emergency in a country that has absolutely no resources, I desire to read to the House a letter from the State administrator of relief in Oklahoma to one of the relief clients. The letter is as follows:

Upon receipt of your recent letter of complaint relative to O. E. R. A. relief work, forwarded to us by Congressman PHIL FERGUSON, this office investigated your case and found that since February you have been called for work regularly. For the past 3 months you have averaged 2 days' work each month, and in April you received a garden-seed order for $2, also a grocery order for $3.

This would indicate that you have not been discriminated against but that you have been given fair treatment in the distribution of both work and direct relief in your county.

For your information, funds allocated to Oklahoma are so limited that 2 or 3 days' work per month is the average amount received by each client, most of whom have very large families, with no resources whatever except their pro rata share of work relief with some commodities. Until larger allocations are received, there is no way we can increase the proportionate share of relief to each client.

Those are the efforts that have been made by existing agencies to meet a situation that is as bad as any flood or tornado or physical catastrophe that may happen to a country. If the agencies in existence are not in a position to take care of starving people and livestock in those dust areas, I think it is the duty of this House to undertake the problem. Therefore I have introduced the above resolution.

[Here the gavel fell.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this on the impeachment matter?

Mr. EKWALL. It is.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. EKWALL. If the gentleman does not want my statement in the RECORD, it is all right.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call attention to what I consider a very fine and splendid dissenting decision handed down by Chief Justice Hughes and Justices Brandeis, Stone, and Cardozo, of the Supreme Court of the United States, pointing to the reasons why they believe the Railroad Retirement Act to be constitutional.

Realizing that many may not have taken the trouble to obtain the decision or scan it as contained in this morning's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, inserted therein by Senator WAGNER, of New York, I take the liberty of pointing out a few of the splendid arguments advanced by Chief Justice Hughes.

A study of his decision convinces that the majority opinion was unprogressive, unconstitutional, and not correct. It should also convince the Democratic side of the House that it acted unwisely when it failed to favorably act upon H. R. 5161, which would have encouraged retirement of some of the reactionary judges of that Court by guaranteeing them a pension and by passing the bill which was presented to this Congress some weeks back and which would, it was believed, have created an opportunity for the President of the United States to appoint men more in accord with the great principles of progress of this day and age and of the new-deal policy of placing human rights above property rights.

I do not believe the decision of the majority endangered the security legislation at all as proposed by the administration, because it was even admitted by the President in his last splendid fireside chat to be for the future and not for the present. He said:

The program for social security now pending before the Congress is a necessary part of the future unemployment policy of the Government.

And again—

Provisions for social security, however, are protections for the future.

It is hardly conceivable that any employer or any industrialist, or any of those who usually challenge legislation enacted by the Congress of the United States, would submit themselves to the great cost of testing the security legislation, since it would not for some time to come, if ever, affect them favorably. It is regrettable, however, and I realize that it is possible, but not necessarily unavoidable under the Constitution of the United States, for one man, after thorough and scholarly consideration of legislation in committee, further consideration in the House, more study before signature by the Speaker, later judicial attention in committee of the Senate, study and debate for days and days or weeks and weeks on the floor of the Senate, and, finally, mature, complete, and deep analysis preceding signature by both the Vice President and the President of the United States, for one man to be able to virtually nullify the action of this entire group that represents the demos of democracy, if such exists, the voice of the people of the United States. I am saying it may be possible under the Constitution of the United States but it is unfortunate and regrettable and should be corrected.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I yield to the distinguished Chairman of the Rules Committee.

Mr. O'CONNOR. One man can do that here. If the vote were 216 to 216, one man could stop any legislation in this country, let alone in this House.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I agree with the gentleman, and that is equally regrettable. [Laughter.]

However, the decision of dissent is worthy of note, and I am going to call your attention to excerpts taken from that masterful decision.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SISSON. Would the gentleman, perhaps, include in his argument—and I sympathize with it to a great extent—that the power of the Supreme Court to set aside an act of Congress is without express authority in the Constitution?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I agree with the gentleman. There is no express authority in the Constitution. The power is only implicit. Some students of the Constitution believe that the constitutional fathers intended it to exist. I will further say, however, if such constitutional power exists by precedent that tyrannical dictatorship could be at least partially cured by enactment of the bill presented yesterday by Mr. RAMSAY, which provides that the inferior courts of the United States and the courts of the several States shall have no jurisdiction to declare any act of Congress unconstitutional. This power shall only be exercised by the Supreme Court of Appeals of the United States whenever three-fourths of the membership of said court shall decide that an act of Congress is in violation of the Constitution or one of its amendments.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'Connor] stated that one vote in the House could set aside legislation or defeat it. That is not quite true when it comes to the Private Calendar. Under the revision of the rules by the gentleman from New York it now takes two. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONAGHAN. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I am very delighted that that revision of the rules occurred, and for that the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'Connor] deserves great credit.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I yield to the distinguished, liberty-loving, and liberty-championing gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Constitutional questions cannot be considered by the House. A bill could be unconstitutional, and everyone would know it, and yet you could not raise that question here in the House when the bill was passed. So it is necessary that there should be a court that can hold the Constitution intact and free from legislative assault.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Would it not save a great deal of the time of the Congress and of the President, however, and would it not save a great deal of the moneys of the people of the United States if we could call that august body before the committee that considered legislation and ask, "What do you think of this legislation?", and let them point out specifically whether they are going to finally nullify or negative such legislation? Such is done in Massachusetts, I understand. In other words, the court is required to give an advisory opinion.

Mr. BLANTON. You cannot try a case until it reaches the Court.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Would it not be far better to have a constitutional amendment passed to the effect that the Supreme Court of the United States shall have no right to declare any law unconstitutional and do away with the precedent set by the decision in the Marbury against Madison case, which is the worst piece of autocracy ever legislated by any court into the constitution of a country?

Mr. BLANTON. Then we would have no government at all. We would have a Communist affair that would be worse than Russia. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I would rather take my chances with the representatives of the people than with nine men appointed for life.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from New York regarding a constitutional amendment and hope it is adopted. Returning to the Supreme Court's decision in the Railroad Retirement Act we find that the Court reverses itself. Justice Hughes says in that connection:

We have sustained a unitary or group system under State compensation acts against the argument under the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment (Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, supra).

The due-process clause which has been used to destroy American liberty rather than to preserve it. He continues:

The Washington Compensation Act established a State fund for the compensation of workmen injured in hazardous employment, and the fund was maintained by compulsory contributions from employers in such industries. While classes of industries were established, each class was made liable for the accidents occurring in that class. The Court described the law as so operating that "the enforced contributions of the employer are to be made whether injuries have befallen his own employees or not, so that however prudently one may manage his business, even to the point of immunity to his employees from accidental injury or death, he nevertheless is required to make periodical contributions to a fund for making compensation to the injured employees of his perhaps negligent competitors" (id., pp. 236, 237). The statute was sustained in the view that its provisions did not rest upon the wrong or neglect of employers, but upon the responsibility which was deemed to attach to those who conducted such industries. The Court concluded "that the State acted within its power in declaring that no employer should conduct such an industry without making stated and fairly apportioned contributions adequate to maintain a public fund for indemnifying injured employees and the dependents of those killed, irrespective of the particular plant in which the accident might happen to occur" (id., p. 244). We followed the reasoning which had led to the upholding of State laws imposing assessments on State banks generally in order to create a guaranty fund to make good the losses of deposits in insolvent banks (Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104. See Abie State Bank v. Bryan, 282 U. S. 765).

But, aside from these analogies, this Court has directly sustained the grouping of railroads for the purpose of regulation in enforcing a common policy deemed to be essential to an adequate national system of transportation, even though it resulted in taking earnings of a strong road to help a weak one. This was the effect of the recapture clause of Transportation Act, 1920, which required carriers to contribute their earnings in excess of a certain amount in order to provide a fund to be used by the Interstate Commerce Commission in making loans to other carriers.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. If the gentleman thinks there is too much arbitrary power vested in one man, what about granting the Secretary of Agriculture the power to fix prices for the farmers and to license farmers—is that proper?

Mr. MONAGHAN. No; I do not agree with that policy. I believe if we were to pass laws here that would create demand for the farmers' commodities, we would not have to be indulging in the various useless and vain act of destroying the crops of the country. To continue the subject under discussion:

Within a space of 40 years the Supreme Court—

Says Dr. John A. Ryan in Declining Liberty and Other Papers—

has read into the words "liberty and property", in the fifth and fourteenth amendments, a new meaning, namely, an excessive and unjust freedom of contract. Owing to this process of amending the Constitution by judicial construction, 8-hour laws, minimum-wage laws, and other legislation for the protection of labor have been nullified. So profound and far-reaching has been the effect of these decisions that Prof. Arthur N. Holcombe, of Harvard, feels justified in describing the change in these terms: "Thus the Supreme Court read into the Federal Constitution an interpretation of the liberty of the due-process clause by which the utilitarians' philosophical idea of liberty was substituted for the specific juristic liberty of the men who wrote the Constitution."

It is clearly a process of supporting legal economic oppression under the guise of safeguarding individual liberty. Decisions of the Supreme Court dealing with progressive legislation almost invariably have been unfavorable and their declaration of unconstitutionality based upon a wrong philosophy of life—a philosophy of rugged individualism on bare 4- to 5-decisions. Outstanding cases of this character are: Lochner v. New York; Coppage v. Kansas; The Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell et al.; and the District of Columbia minimum-wage case. In these cases the Supreme Court decided that laws for the protection of the weak were unconstitutional and in violation of the fifth and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution. They speak in high-sounding phrase of the freedom of the employer; but what of the freedom of the employee? The employee is not free to work or not. There are millions of unemployed and man is not a drudge. Thus the protection of private interest was promoted by declaring a law unconstitutional which prevented bakers from being employed more than 10 hours a day, which prohibited employers to dismiss employees because of membership in labor unions, and forbidding the employment of women at less than living wages. These laws supposedly deprived the employer of his great liberty. What liberty? The liberty to crush the weak under the iron heel of oppression, of greed, and of selfishness?

Chief Justice Hughes points out the apparent inconsistency of setting aside the contributory-negligence and fellow-servant rule and assumption-of-risk doctrine which occurred in the case of the St. Louis & Iron Mountain Railway Co. v. Taylor, Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, Wilson v. New, and Texas & New Orleans R. R. Co. v. Railway Clerks, and at the same time failed to permit protection of the employees who have reached a retirement age. To note his language, he specifically states:

If Congress may supply a uniform rule in the one case, why not in the other? If affording certainty of protection is deemed to be an aid to efficiency, why should that consideration be ruled out with respect to retirement allowances and be admitted to support compensation allowances.

In that connection he further pursues his reasoning to its logical conclusion and says:

An attempted distinction as to pension measures for employees retired by reason of age because old age is not in itself a consequence of employment, is but superficial. The common judgment takes note of the fact that the retirement of workers by reason of incapacity due to advancing years is an incident of employment and that a fair consideration of their plight justifies retirement allowances as a feature of the service to which they have long been devoted. What sound distinction, from a constitutional standpoint, is there between compelling reasonable compensation for those injured without any fault of the employer and requiring a fair allowance for those who practically give their lives to the service and are incapacitated by the wear and tear of time, the attrition of the years?

The false philosophy which motivated the majority decision is no better illustrated than by the weakness pointed to by Chief Justice Hughes, when he says:

Congress may, indeed, it seems to be assumed, compel the elimination of aged employees. A retirement act for that purpose might be passed. But not a pension act. The Government's power is conceived to be limited to a requirement that the railroads dismiss their superannuated employees, throwing them out helpless, without any reasonable provision for their protection.

And he concludes the opinion with the following language:

The power committed to Congress to govern interstate commerce does not require that its government should be wise, much less that it should be perfect. The power implies a broad discretion and thus permits a wide range even of mistakes. Expert discussion of pension plans reveals different views of the manner in which they should be set up, and a close study of advisable methods is in progress. It is not our province to enter that field, and I am not persuaded that Congress in entering it for the purpose of regulating interstate carriers, has transcended the limits of the authority which the Constitution confers.

It was the belief of the Chief Justice and he so stated on the first page of his opinion that the majority finally raise a barrier against all legislative action of this nature by declaring that the subject matter itself lies beyond the reach of the congressional authority to regulate interstate commerce. In that view, no matter how suitably limited a pension act for railroad employees might be with respect to the persons to be benefited, or how appropriate the measure of retirement allowances, or how sound actuarially the plan, or how well adjusted the burden, still under this decision Congress would not be at liberty to enact such a measure.

Referring to the proposal that an act of Congress passed by the Congress and signed by the President, or over his veto, shall not become invalid unless declared so by three-fourths of the Supreme Court, permit me to refer back to the opinion wherein Supreme Court Justice Sutherland said:

This Court, by an unbroken line of decisions from Chief Justice Marshall to the present day, has steadily adhered to the rule that every possible presumption is in favor of the validity of an act of Congress until overcome beyond rational doubt. (Minimum-wage case of the District of Columbia.)

When 4 justices hold tenaciously to constitutionality, how can 5 believe the matter to be beyond rational doubt? Surely they believe their associates to be reasonable men, and if such, then the matter of constitutionality is in such case a matter of rational doubt. Again, if every possible presumption is to be accorded the constitutionality of a measure, then we should place around that presumption safeguards that would make it real and not a matter of mere majority opinion. It is true, however, that the constitutional amendment suggested of compelling the decision to at least be by a three-fourths vote may not guarantee the presumption, but it would at least remove a measure of the injustice that does exist. In fact it would seem that the better way to guarantee the presumption would be to require that the Court be unanimous in its decision in order to make a statute unconstitutional.

It is believed by Dr. John A. Ryan, a very astute student of this problem, that this difficulty, especially as it affects industrial or labor legislation may be overcome by direct legislative action of the Congress without resorting to constitutional amendment, and with that in mind I shall introduce shortly a bill which so provides.

The basis of this hope—

Says Dr. Ryan—

lies in article III, section 2, paragraph 2 of the Federal Constitution, which declares: "In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." It should be noted that cases involving the constitutionality of minimum wage laws and all other forms of industrial legislation come before the Supreme Court on appeal from an inferior tribunal. When the Court pronounces such a law, constitutional or unconstitutional, it is exercising "appellate jurisdiction." Since the words just quoted from the Constitution declare that this jurisdiction shall be exercised by the Court "with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make", there is very good reason to hold that Congress has the constitutional power to regulate the procedure of the Court. Congress apparently can require a seven-ninths or an eight-ninths, or even a unanimous vote, in order to declare laws unconstitutional. At any rate, the Supreme Court could construe this provision in this sense, without stretching its meaning as far as it has expanded the content of many other clauses in the Constitution.

It is for that reason that I raise my voice today. I believe one of two things should be done, and in this emergency I say that which some believe to be the more drastic thing, but which was done for a less noble purpose during the administration of President Grant, and that is that the President of the United States should add to that all-wise and omnipotent body a sufficient number of new members to give force and effect to the decrees and policies of economic recovery and the progressive principles which the American people so emphatically declared to be their will in the last election.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein such excerpts from the dissenting opinion of the Supreme Court as I may select.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

UNFAIR CRITICISMS OF THIS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, in recent months I have often been impatient with unfair criticisms and misrepresentations of the policies and purposes of the national administration. But I have tried also to realize that many, confused and uncertain as to what is actually being done and what are the objects of the Government, are honestly in fear of the destruction of liberty by public officials who are in fact just as honestly doing all in their power to preserve our constitutional liberties.

It makes me writhe to see the propaganda being spread by former President Herbert Hoover which would lead us to believe we are in danger of losing our individualism.

Recently he addressed the California Conference of Social Workers in which he said:

The people must be taught to cling to their family life, to their homes, to their individual self-respect, to their rights, to their individual liberties.

They must be taught not to change their souls and spirits for the fallacious promises of material comforts. It is the unfailing record of mankind that in such an exchange the individual finds himself robbed of all that he had, both spiritually and materially.

Our people are not ready to be turned into a national zoo, our citizens classified, labeled, and directed by a form of self-approved keepers.

I rest content that the people of the country will decide for themselves whether they care to intrust their sacred liberties to the reckless crew of pirates who ran riot with the destinies of the people in the Hoover period of quicksand prosperity, or whether they will trust their destiny to the understanding leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

With 4 years of dreadful ruin behind him, and because of him, Mr. Hoover now assumes that he alone knows what should be done today.

There is scarcely a single family between the seas that does not recall his record while he was engaged in "the elimination of poverty" and in putting "two chickens in every pot."

And when the financial structure of the Nation was tottering, when industry was languishing, when agriculture was in bankruptcy, when 14,000,000 breadwinners were denied their right to work, what had this pretentious prophet, Mr. Hoover, to propose?

Where was his wisdom then?

Who is this solemn-faced gentleman who warns our people by saying they are not ready to be turned into a national zoo and directed by a form of self-approved keepers?

You will remember the vicious greed of the greatest wild-cat market speculation that this country has ever known. You will recall the bulls and the bears with their "rule or ruin" policy.

What the elephant—the symbol of the Old Guard—wants is "parrotlike" men in office who will be "satisfactory." What they want is a "gorilla" grip on affairs of the country for the profit of a few of the large bankers.

You will recall that powerful banks, custodians of the people's hard-earned money, were so busy with speculation that they had no money to loan for legitimate business enterprise. You have not forgotten how that false prosperity on paper, in which a few grew rich on the credulity of the many, was held forth as a proof of the capacity of these critics to rule. You must remember that instead of seeking to moderate the madness, the Government, dominated by these critics, gave every possible encouragement to the debauch by issuing officially false and misleading statements. And you will remember the inevitable crash, for the page that records that tragedy will ever remain one of the blackest in our history.

You will remember—for you cannot forget such things in 2 short years—the resulting crash of banks, crushing the hopes of millions whose life savings were thus swept away.

And in those days of despairing misery in this land of plenty, what single intelligent plan did Mr. Hoover or any other of his minor figures in the mockery of present-day criticism advance to meet the gravest crisis we have ever known?

I challenge contradiction—they did not advance a single idea, and I offer the national zoo of the former administration stocked with its elephant, its wildcat, its bulls and bears, its parrot-like advisers for observation and amusement.

Let me stir your memory again: is it not true that this old gang of the Old Guard that now urges you back to the sterile days of Hooverism, sat dazed by the magnitude of the ruin their lack of policy had wrought, silent in their fear, twirling their thumbs, in the nervous apprehension of their utter helplessness?

Do they want to go back to a system of cutthroat competition which rewards the sweatshop operator? Do they want to chance another period of economic stagnation in which employees are turned into the streets, bereft of purchasing power or hope? Do they prefer a society in which the aged are paupers and nonconsumers of industry's goods?

Only last week, one after another, speakers mounted the rostrum at the United States Chamber of Commerce meeting and assailed the new deal, which rescued American business from bankruptcy.

The gratitude of these business orators is exceeded only by their short-sightedness.

"We cannot have recovery and reform both, Mr. President", they say. "Let us alone and we will give you recovery. Then reform can come later. Quit meddling with the banks. Quit bothering the utilities. Quit spending so much money."

Strangely the speakers never attempt to explain how, if reforms had not come first, business could ever have gained the measure of recovery that now blesses it. They do not mention the obvious truth that the Nation's banks are today open and doing business with a confident public largely because the administration first overhauled the banking structure.

Business was left alone by the Hoover administration. Did it bring recovery? What was the status of the farm industry and the oil industry before the new-deal production control reforms? What was the value of farm and home mortgages before the Government stepped in? What confidence did the public have in the securities market before the Government put check reins on the manipulators?

Recovery, these business men admit, depends largely upon public confidence. They have not yet discovered that public confidence depends largely upon reforms.

But in justice to their mentality I sometimes wonder if they were as dumb as they seemed. I have sometimes thought that they preferred to stand pat on their policies, which built up a system of privilege whereby a small group waxed wealthy while the average man lost his birthright, rather than correct the wrongs on which they thrived, in the desperate hope that the storm would pass, and that with the system of privilege intact the exploitation of the millions might go on.

At any rate, you well remember how the army of the unemployed increased, how the bank failures constantly accelerated, how the bankruptcies of merchants multiplied; how hard-earned homes were swept away; how month by month more factory wheels stopped turning; how day by day the farmers were dispossessed, and week by week the line of jobless lengthened.

The other type of opposition is the pettifogging insistence upon the right of one individual to have his special economic interest protected against the overwhelming mass of general economic interests which must then be sacrificed for his particular benefit. The distress of one person may make an appealing newspaper story. It may permit a political or judicial demagogue to make a stump speech upholding the rights of the "little fellow." But when millions of men walk the streets unemployed and millions have been put to work principally by establishing decent labor standards, it is mighty poor citizenship to attempt to strengthen the powers of individuals, to break down such standards of wages and hours, on the specious plea that in a particular instance a few more men might be employed at sweatshop wages. [Applause.] To preserve the liberty of a few to work under bad conditions and thereby to sacrifice liberty of the many to work under decent conditions, is to strain at a very small gnat and swallow a very large camel. Two more animals to be added to Mr. Hoover's zoo.

It will not be necessary for me to recite the story of the Roosevelt administration; how it came to the rescue of the banking situation; how it came to the rescue of the distressed home owner; how it came to the rescue of the impoverished farmer; how it came to the rescue of business; how it swept away the fog of unreasoning fear and gave the average man the feeling of hope that here at last was a leader who could lead, a President who would pilot us out of the storms that were shaking the ship of state from stem to stern.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEITER. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. The gentleman should not forget to mention that under President Roosevelt over 800,000 homes of poor people have been saved.

Mr. BEITER. Charges have been made recently that the Democratic Party has taken away the liberty of the American people. What a ridiculous charge to make against a party of which human liberty has always been one of the most important aims. One hundred and forty years ago Thomas Jefferson first formulated the liberal doctrines that definitely established the principles from which the Democratic Party was organized. That party has survived. It has lived through 1 domestic and 4 foreign wars. It has lived through economic depressions; it has lived through periods of business prosperity. It has lived because it has served. Wealth has not dulled its conscience, nor want subdued it.

The freedom which we must seek and must preserve in the modern world is not the freedom of a wild beast to hunt alone and fight a world of enemies. It is the freedom of a civilized man to live in a well-organized community where he works with and for his fellow men, where he fulfills obligations to them and they in turn fulfill their obligations to him. Those ancient liberties for which mankind has always struggled are just as precious, just as well worth fighting for today as they ever were. But we must restrain and discipline ourselves more and more in order to enjoy the advantages of modern life and to preserve our freedom and security in this modern world. [Applause.]

BANKING ACT OF 1935

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7617) to provide for the sound, effective, and unin-interrupted operation of the banking system, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. WOODRUM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Is the bill to be read by subdivisions or sections?

The CHAIRMAN. By sections.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Does the Chair mean that the 43 pages of title I will be read before any amendment is offered?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Title I is section 101.

Mr. McCORMACK (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, everybody knows what title I is, and I ask unanimous consent that further reading of that title be dispensed with and it be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Title I is as follows:

TITLE I—FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE

SECTION 101. Section 12 B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 264), is further amended as follows:

1. By striking out subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) There is hereby created a Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (hereinafter referred to as the 'corporation'), which shall insure, as hereinafter provided, the deposits of all banks which are entitled to the benefits of insurance under this section, and which shall have the right to exercise all powers hereinafter granted."

2. By adding at the end of subsection (b) the following: "In the event of a vacancy in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and pending the appointment of his successor, the Acting Comptroller of the Currency shall be a member of the board of directors in the place and stead of the Comptroller. In the absence of the Comptroller of the Currency any Deputy Comptroller of the Currency, as designated from time to time by the Comptroller, may, within the limits prescribed by the Comptroller, act as a member of the board of directors in his place and stead. In the event of a vacancy in the office of the chairman of the board of directors, and pending the appointment of his successor, the Comptroller of the Currency shall act as chairman. The Comptroller of the Currency shall be ineligible during the time he is in office and for 2 years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any insured bank. The appointive members of the board of directors shall be ineligible during the time they are in office and for 2 years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any insured bank, except that this restriction shall not apply to a member who has served the full term for which he was appointed. No member of the board of directors shall be an officer or director of any bank, banking institution, trust company, or Federal Reserve bank or hold stock in any bank, banking institution, or trust company; and before entering upon his duties as a member of the board of directors he shall certify under oath that he has complied with this requirement and such certification shall be filed with the secretary of the board of directors. No member of the board of directors serving on the board of directors at the effective date shall be subject to any of the provisions of the three preceding sentences until the expiration of his present term of office."

3. By inserting a new subsection to read as follows:

"(c) As used in this section—

"(1) The term 'State bank' means any bank, banking association, trust company, savings bank, or other banking institution which is engaged in the business of receiving deposits and which is incorporated under the laws of any State or the Territory of Hawaii or Alaska or which is operating under the Code of the District of Columbia (except a national bank).

"(2) The term 'State member bank' means any State bank which is a member of the Federal Reserve System, and the term 'State nonmember bank' means any other State bank.

"(3) The term 'District bank' means any State bank operating under the Code of the District of Columbia.

"(4) The term 'national member bank' means any national bank located in the States of the United States, the District of Columbia, or the Territories of Hawaii or Alaska, except a national nonmember bank as hereinafter defined.

"(5) The term 'national nonmember bank' means any national bank located in the Territories of Hawaii or Alaska which is not a member of the Federal Reserve System.

"(6) The term 'mutual savings bank' means a bank without capital stock transacting a savings bank business, the net earnings of which inure wholly to the benefit of its depositors after payment of obligations for any advances by its organizers.

"(7) The term 'savings bank' means a bank, other than a mutual savings bank, transacting a strictly savings bank business under State laws imposing special requirements on such banks governing the manner of investing their funds and of conducting their business: Provided, That the bank maintains, until maturity date or until withdrawn, all deposits made with it, exclusive of funds held by it in a fiduciary capacity, as time savings deposits of the specific term type or of the type where the right to require written notice before permitting withdrawal is reserved: Provided further, That such bank to be considered a savings bank must elect to become subject to regulations of the corporation respecting the redeposit of maturing deposits and prohibiting withdrawal of deposits by checking except from specifically designated deposit accounts totaling not more than 15 percent of the bank's total deposits.

"(8) The term 'insured bank' means any bank the deposits of which are insured in accordance with the provisions of this section, and the term 'noninsured bank' means any other bank.

"(9) The term 'new bank' means a new national banking association organized by the corporation to assume the insured deposits of an insured bank closed on account of inability to meet the demands of its depositors and otherwise to perform temporarily the functions prescribed in this section.

"(10) The term 'receiver' shall include a receiver, liquidating agent, conservator, commission, person, or other agency charged by law with the duty of winding up the affairs of a bank.

"(11) The term 'board of directors' means the board of directors of the corporation.

"(12) The term 'deposit' means the unpaid balance of money or its equivalent received by a bank in the usual course of business and for which it has given or is obligated to give unconditional credit to a commercial, checking, savings, time or thrift account, or which is evidenced by its certificate of deposit, and trust funds held by such bank whether retained or deposited in any department of such bank or deposited in another bank, together with such other obligations of a bank as the board of directors shall find and shall prescribe by its regulations to be deposit liabilities by general usage: Provided, That any obligation of a bank which is payable only at an office of the bank located outside the States of the United States, the District of Columbia, and the Territories of Hawaii and Alaska shall not be a deposit for purposes of this section or be included as a part of total deposits or of an insured deposit. The board of directors may by regulation further define the terms used in this paragraph.

"(13) The term 'insured deposit' means such part of the net amount of money due to any depositor for deposits in an insured bank, after deducting offsets, as shall not exceed the maximum prescribed by paragraph (1) of subsection (1) of this section. Such amount shall be determined according to such regulations as the board of directors may prescribe. In determining the amount due to any depositor there shall be added together all deposits in the bank maintained in the same capacity and the same right for his benefit either in his own name or in the names of others, except trust funds which shall be insured as provided in paragraph (8) of subsection (h) of this section.

"(14) The term 'transferred deposit' means a deposit in a new bank or other insured bank made available to a depositor by the corporation as payment of the insured deposit of such depositor in a closed bank, and assumed by such new bank or other insured bank.

"(15) The term 'effective date' means the date of enactment of the Banking Act of 1935."

4. By striking out in subsection (c) "(c)" and inserting "(d)"; by striking out in said subsection (c) that part of the third sentence following the words "Federal Reserve banks" in said sentence and inserting a period; by striking out in subsection (d) "(d)" and the first four sentences of said subsection (d); and by striking out in the fifth sentence of said subsection the following: "class B"; and by inserting at the end of subsection "(d)" the following: "The capital stock of the corporation shall consist of the shares subscribed for prior to the effective date. Such stock shall be without nominal or par value, and shares issued prior to the effective date shall be exchanged and reissued at the rate of one share for each $100 paid into the corporation for capital stock. The consideration received by the corporation for the capital stock shall be allocated to capital and to surplus in such amounts as the board of directors shall prescribe. Such stock shall have no vote and shall not be entitled to the payment of dividends."

5. By striking out subsection (e) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(e) (1) Every operating member bank, including a bank incorporated since March 10, 1933, licensed on or before the effective date by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be and continue without application or approval an insured bank and shall be subject to the provisions of this section.

"(2) After the effective date any national member bank authorized to commence or resume the business of banking, State bank converting into a national member bank, or State bank becoming a member of the Federal Reserve System shall be an insured bank from the time the certificate herein prescribed shall be issued to the corporation by the Comptroller of the Currency in the case of such national member bank, or by the Federal Reserve Board in the case of such State member bank: Provided, That in the case of an insured bank admitted to membership in the Federal Reserve System or insured State bank converting into a national member bank, such certificate shall not be required, and the bank shall continue as an insured bank. Such certificate shall state that the bank is authorized to transact the business of banking in the case of a national member bank, or is a member of the Federal Reserve System in the case of a State member bank, and that consideration has been given to the factors enumerated in subsection (g) of this section."

6. By striking out subsection (f) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(f) (1) Every bank not a member of the Federal Reserve System which on the effective date is a member of the Temporary Federal Deposit Insurance Fund or of the Fund for Mutuals created pursuant to the provisions of the Banking Act of 1933, as amended (48 Stat. 168, 969; chs. 89, 546), shall be and continue without application or approval an insured bank and shall be subject to the provisions of this section, unless in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the board of directors such bank shall give to the corporation and to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, if it owns or holds as pledgee any preferred stock, capital notes, or debentures of such bank, within 30 days after the effective date written notice of its election not to continue after June 30, 1935, as an insured bank and shall give to its depositors, by publication or by any reasonable means, as the board of directors may prescribe, not less than 20 days' notice prior to June 30, 1935, of such election: Provided, That any State nonmember bank which was admitted to said Temporary Federal Deposit Insurance Fund or Fund for Mutuals but which did not file on or before the effective date on October 1, 1934, certified statement and make the payments thereon required by law as it existed prior to the effective date, shall cease to be an insured bank on June 30, 1935: Provided further, That no bank admitted to the said Temporary Federal Deposit Insurance Fund or the Fund for Mutuals prior to the effective date shall, after June 30, 1935, be an insured bank or have its deposits insured by the corporation, if such bank shall have permanently discontinued its banking operations prior to the effective date. Deposits of the bank giving such notice shall continue to be insured until June 30, 1935, and the rights of the bank shall be as provided by law existing prior to the effective date, and such bank shall not be insured by the corporation beyond June 30, 1935.

"(2) Subject to the provisions of this section, any national nonmember bank, on application by the bank and certification by the Comptroller of the Currency in the manner prescribed in subsection (e) of this section, and any State nonmember bank, upon application to and examination by the corporation and approval by the board of directors, may become an insured bank. Before approving the application of any such State nonmember bank, the board of directors shall give consideration to the factors enumerated in subsection (g) of this section and shall determine, upon the basis of a thorough examination of such bank, that its assets in excess of its capital requirements are adequate to enable it to meet all of its liabilities as shown by the books of the bank to depositors and other creditors."

7. By striking out subsection (g) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(g) The factors to be enumerated in the certificate required under subsection (e) and to be considered by the board of directors under subsection (f) shall be the financial condition of the bank and the adequacy of its capital structure."

8. By striking out subsection (h) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(h) (1) The assessment rate shall be one-eighth of 1 percent per annum based upon the average of the total amount of the liability of the bank for deposits (according to the definition of the term 'deposits' in and pursuant to paragraph (12) of subsection (c) of this section, without any deduction for indebtedness of depositors). The average of such total shall be determined as of the close of business on one day of each of 3 or more months preceding July and January of each year, such days to be designated by the directors in the manner provided in the next succeeding paragraph. In the event a separate fund for mutuals be established, the board of directors from time to time may fix a lower rate operative for such period as the board may determine applicable to insured mutual savings banks only.

"(2) During the months of June and December of each year the board of directors shall designate 3 or more dates, one in each of 3 or more months of the current semiannual period, for which the insured banks shall report their deposit liabilities for the purpose of assessment. On or before the 15th day of July of each year, each insured bank shall file with the corporation a certified statement under oath showing the total amount of its liability for deposits as of the close of business on the 3 or more days so designated and shall pay to the corporation the portion of the annual assessment equal to one-half of the annual rate fixed by this subsection (h) multiplied by the average of its total deposits for such days as are designated. On or before the 15th day of January of each year each insured bank shall file a like statement showing the total amount of its liability for deposits as of the close of business on the 3 or more days designated as hereinbefore provided, and shall pay to the Corporation the portion of the annual assessment equal to one-half of the annual rate fixed by this subsection (h) multiplied by the average of its total deposits for such days as are designated.

"(3) Every bank which becomes an insured bank after the effective date shall be admitted without liability for the current semiannual payment but it shall file with the corporation a certified statement under oath showing the total amount of its liability for deposits at the close of business on the fifteenth day after it becomes an insured bank and it shall pay to the corporation as an initial assessment the prorated portion for the period between the date such bank became an insured bank and the next succeeding last day of June or December, as the case may be, of an amount equal to one-half the annual assessment rate provided in this section multiplied by such total deposits. The first semiannual payment after the initial payment shall be made according to the provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection in all cases where the bank shall have been in operation throughout the preceding semiannual period and in all other cases according to its certified statement under oath showing the deposit liability at a date designated by the board of directors.

"(4) Each bank which shall be and continue without application or approval an insured bank in accordance with the provisions of subsection (e) or (f) of this section, shall, in lieu of all right to refund, be credited with any balance to which such bank shall become entitled upon the termination of said temporary Federal deposit-insurance fund or the fund for mutuals. The credit shall be applied by the corporation toward the payment of the assessment next becoming due from such bank and upon succeeding assessments until the credit is exhausted.

"(5) Any insured bank which fails to file such certified statement or statements as it is lawfully required to file in connection with determining the amount of assessment or assessments due the corporation, may be compelled to file such statement or statements by mandatory injunction or other appropriate remedy in a suit brought by the corporation against the bank and any officer or officers thereof, for the purpose stated, in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction in the district or territory in which such bank is located.

"(6) The corporation, in a suit brought at law or in equity in any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be entitled to recover from any insured bank any unpaid assessment or assessments lawfully due from such insured bank to the corporation, regardless of whether or not such bank shall have filed the certified statement or statements it is lawfully required to file, and regardless of whether or not suit shall have been brought to compel such statement or statements to be filed.

"(7) Should any national member bank now or hereafter organized, or should any national nonmember bank which is now or hereafter becomes an insured bank, omit to file any certified statement required to be filed by such bank under any provision of this section, or to pay the assessment required to be paid under any provision of this section by such bank on any certified statement filed by it, and should any such bank not correct such omission to file or to pay within 30 days after written notice has been given by the corporation to an officer of the bank, citing this paragraph, and stating that the bank has omitted to file or pay as required by law, all the rights, privileges, and franchises of the offending bank granted to it under the National Bank Act or under the provisions of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, shall be thereby forfeited. Whether or not the penalty provided in this paragraph has been incurred shall be determined and adjudged in the manner provided in the sixth paragraph of section 2 of this act, as amended. The remedies provided in this paragraph and in the two preceding paragraphs shall not be construed as limiting any other remedies against any bank, but shall be in addition thereto.

"(8) Trust funds held by an insured bank in a fiduciary capacity, whether held in its trust or deposited in any other department or in another bank, shall be insured subject to a $5,000 limit for each trust estate, and when deposited by the fiduciary bank in another insured bank shall be similarly insured to the fiduciary bank according to the trust estates represented. Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, such insurance shall be separate from and additional to that covering other deposits of the owners of such trust funds or beneficiaries of such trust estates: Provided, That where the fiduciary bank deposits any of such trust funds in other insured banks, the amount so held by other insured banks on deposit shall not for the purpose of the certified statement required under paragraph (2) or (3) of subsection (h) of this section, be considered to be a deposit liability of the fiduciary bank, but shall be considered a deposit liability of the bank in which such funds are so deposited by such fiduciary bank. The board of directors shall have power by regulation to prescribe the manner of reporting and of depositing such funds."

9. By striking out subsection (1) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) (1) Any insured bank (except a national member bank or State member bank) may, upon not less than 90 days' written notice to the corporation, and to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation if it owns or holds as pledgee any preferred stock, capital notes, or debentures of such bank, terminate its status as an insured bank. Wherever the board of directors shall find that an insured bank or its directors or trustees have continued unsafe or unsound practices in conducting the business of such bank or have knowingly or negligently permitted any of its officers or agents to violate any provision of this section or of any material regulation made thereunder, or of any law or material regulation made pursuant to law to which the insured bank is subject, the board of directors shall first give to the Comptroller of the Currency in the case of a national bank or district bank, to the authority having supervision in case of a State bank, and also to the Federal Reserve Board in case of a State member bank, a statement of such violation by the bank for the purpose of securing a correction of such practices or conditions. Unless such correction shall be made within 120 days or such shorter period of time as the Comptroller of the Currency, the State authority, or Federal Reserve Board, as the case may be, shall require, the board of directors, if it shall determine to proceed further, shall give to the bank not less than 30 days' written notice of intention to terminate the status of the bank as an insured bank, fixing a time and place for a hearing before the board of directors or before a person designated by it to conduct such hearing, at which evidence may be produced, and upon such evidence the board of directors shall make written findings which shall be conclusive. Unless the bank shall appear at the hearing by a duly authorized representative, it shall be deemed to have consented to the termination of its status as an insured bank. If the board of directors shall find that any violation specified in such notice has been established, the board of directors may order that the insured status of the bank be terminated on a date subsequent to such finding and to the expiration of the time specified in such notice of intention. The Corporation may publish notice of such termination and the bank shall give notice of such termination to its depositors, in such manner and at such time as the board of directors may find necessary and may order for the protection of depositors. After termination of the insured status of any bank under the provisions of this paragraph, the insured deposits of each depositor in the bank on the date of such termination, less all subsequent withdrawals from any deposits of such depositor, shall continue for a period of 2 years to be insured and the bank shall continue to pay to the corporation assessments as in the case of an insured bank for such period of 2 years from such termination, but no additions to any deposits or any new deposits shall be insured by the corporation, and the bank shall not advertise or hold itself out as having insured deposits unless in the same connection it shall state with equal prominence that additions to deposits and new deposits made after the date of such termination, specifying such date, are not insured. Such bank shall in all other respects be subject to the duties and obligations of an insured bank for the period of 2 years from such termination and in the event of being closed on account of inability to meet the demands of its depositors within such period of 2 years, the corporation shall have the same powers and rights with respect to such bank as in case of an insured bank.

"(2) Whenever the insured status of a member bank shall be terminated by action of the board of directors, the Federal Reserve Board in the case of a State member bank shall terminate its membership in the Federal Reserve System in accordance with the provisions of section 9 of this act, and in the case of a national member bank, the Comptroller of the Currency shall appoint a receiver for the bank (to be the corporation whenever the bank shall be unable to meet the demands of its depositors).

"(3) When the liabilities of an insured bank for deposits shall have been assumed by another insured bank or banks, the insured status of the bank whose liabilities are so assumed shall terminate on the date of receipt by the corporation of satisfactory evidence of such assumption with like effect as if terminated on said date by the board of directors after proceedings under paragraph (1) of this subsection (1): Provided, That if the bank whose liabilities are so assumed gives to its depositors notice of such assumption within 30 days after such assumption takes effect, by publication or by any reasonable means, in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the board of directors, the insurance of its deposits shall terminate at the end of 6 months from the date such assumption takes effect and such bank shall be relieved of all future obligations to the corporation, including the obligation to pay future assessments."

10. By adding at the end of paragraph "Fourth" of subsection (j) the following: "All suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity to which the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation shall be a party shall be deemed to arise under the laws of the United States: Provided, That any such suit to which the corporation is a party in its capacity as receiver of a State bank and which involves only the rights or obligations of depositors, creditors, stockholders, and such State bank under State law shall not be deemed to arise under the laws of the United States. No attachment or execution shall be issued against the corporation or its property before final judgment in any suit, action, or proceeding in any State, county, municipal, or United States court. The board of directors shall designate an agent upon whom service of process may be made in any State, Territory, or jurisdiction in which any insured bank is located"; and by inserting at the end of said subsection the following:

"Eighth. To make examinations of and to require information and reports from banks, as provided in this section.

"Ninth. To act as receiver.

"Tenth. To prescribe by its board of directors such rules and regulations as it may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this section."

11. By striking out in subsection (k) the following: "(k)", and inserting in lieu thereof "(k) (1)"; and by adding to said subsection three new paragraphs to read as follows:

"(2) The board of directors shall appoint examiners, who shall have power on behalf of the corporation (except as to a District bank) to examine any insured State nonmember bank, State nonmember bank making application to become an insured bank, or closed insured bank, whenever considered necessary. Such examiners shall have like power to examine, with the written consent of the Comptroller of the Currency, any national bank, or District bank and, with the written consent of the Federal Reserve Board, any State member bank. Each examiner shall have power to make a thorough examination of all of the affairs of the bank and in doing so he shall have power to administer oaths and to examine and take and preserve the testimony of any of the officers and agents thereof under oath and shall make a full and detailed report of the condition of the bank to the corporation. The board of directors in like manner shall appoint claim agents who shall have power to investigate and examine all claims for insured deposits and transferred deposits. Each claim agent shall have power to administer oaths and to examine under oath and take and preserve testimony of any persons relating to such claims. Any such examiner or claim agent in relation to any such examination, investigation, or taking of testimony may apply to any judge or clerk of any court of the United States to issue subpoenas and to compel the appearance of witnesses and the production and taking of any such testimony and to punish disobedience in like manner as provided in sections 184 to 186 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 5, secs. 94 to 96).

"(3) Each insured State nonmember bank (except a District bank) shall make to the corporation reports of condition in such form and at such times as the board of directors may require of such bank. The board of directors may require such reports to be published in such manner, not inconsistent with any applicable law, as it may direct. Every such bank which fails to make or publish any such report within such time, not less than 5 days, as the board of directors may require may be subject to a penalty of $100 for each day of such failure, recoverable by the corporation for its use.

"(4) The corporation shall have access to reports of examinations made by and reports of condition made to the Comptroller of the Currency or any Federal Reserve bank, and may accept any report made by or to any commission, board, or authority having supervision of a State nonmember bank (except a District bank), and may furnish to the Comptroller of the Currency, or any such Federal Reserve bank, commission, board, or authority, reports of examinations made on behalf of and reports of condition made to the corporation."

12. By striking out all of subsection (l) preceding the last paragraph thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) (1) The Temporary Federal Deposit Insurance Fund and the Fund for Mutuals are hereby consolidated into the permanent insurance fund for deposits created by this section, and the assets therein shall be held by the corporation for the uses and purposes of the corporation: Provided, That the obligations to and rights of the corporation, depositors, banks, and other persons arising out of any event or transaction prior to the effective date shall remain unimpaired. From the effective date the corporation shall insure the deposits of all insured banks as defined and provided in this section. The maximum amount of the insured deposit of any depositor shall be $5,000. The corporation, in the discretion of the board of directors, may open on its books, solely for the benefit of mutual savings banks and depositors therein, a separate fund for mutuals. If such a fund is opened, all assessments of each mutual savings bank shall be made a part of such fund, and the other permanent insurance funds of the corporation shall cease to be liable for losses sustained in mutual savings banks: Provided, That the capital assets of the corporation shall be so liable and all expenses of operation of the corporation shall be allocated on an equitable basis.

"(2) An insured bank shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to have been closed on account of inability to meet the demands of its depositors in any case where it has been closed for the purpose of liquidation without adequate provision for payment of its depositors.

"(3) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, whenever any insured national bank or insured District bank shall have been closed by action of its board of directors or the Comptroller of the Currency, as the case may be, on account of inability to meet the demands of its depositors, the Comptroller of the Currency shall appoint the corporation receiver for such closed bank and no other person shall be appointed as receiver of such closed bank.

"(4) It shall be the duty of the corporation as such receiver to realize upon the assets of such closed bank, having due regard to the condition of credit in the locality; to enforce the individual liability of the stockholders and directors thereof; and to wind up the affairs of such closed bank in conformity with the provisions of law relating to the liquidation of closed national banks, except as herein otherwise provided, retaining for its own account such portion of the amount realized from such liquidation as it shall be entitled to receive on account of its subrogation to the claims of depositors and paying to depositors and other creditors the net amount available for distribution to them. With respect to such closed bank, the corporation as such receiver shall have all the rights, powers, and privileges now possessed by or hereafter given a receiver of an insolvent national bank.

"(5) Whenever any insured State bank, except a District bank, shall have been closed by action of its board of directors or by the authority having supervision of such bank, as the case may be, on account of inability to meet the demands of its depositors, the corporation shall accept appointment as receiver thereof, if such appointment be tendered by the authority having supervision of such bank and be authorized or permitted by State law. With respect to such insured State bank, the corporation shall possess the powers and privileges given by State law to a receiver of such State bank.

"(6) When an insured bank shall have been closed on account of inability to meet the demands of its depositors, payment of the insured deposits shall be made by the corporation as soon as possible, subject to the provisions of paragraph (7) of this subsection (1), either (a) by making available to each depositor a transferred deposit in a new bank in the same community or in another insured bank in an amount equal to the insured deposit of such depositor and subject to withdrawal on demand, or (b) in accordance with any other procedure adopted by the board of directors: Provided, That the corporation, in its discretion, may require proof of claims to be filed before paying the insured deposits, and that in any case where the corporation is not satisfied as to the validity of a claim for an insured deposit, it may require the final determination of a court of competent jurisdiction before paying such claim.

"(7) In the case of a closed national bank or District bank the corporation, upon payment of any depositor as provided in paragraph (6) of this subsection (1) shall become and be subrogated to all rights of the depositor to the extent of such payment. In the case of any other closed insured bank, the corporation shall not pay any depositor until the right of the corporation to be subrogated to the rights of such depositor on the same basis as provided in the case of a closed national bank under this section shall have been recognized, by express provisions of State law, by allowance of claims by the authority having supervision of such bank, by assignment of claims by depositors, or by any other effective method. Such subrogation in the case of any closed bank shall include the right to receive the same dividends from the proceeds of the assets of such closed bank and recoveries on account of stockholders' liability as would have been payable to such depositor on a claim for the insured deposit, such depositor retaining his claim for any uninsured portion of his deposit: Provided, That the rights of depositors and other creditors of any State bank shall be determined in accordance with the applicable provisions of State law.

"(8) As soon as possible, the corporation, if it finds that it is advisable and in the interest of the depositors of the closed bank or the public, shall organize a new bank to assume the insured deposits of such closed bank and otherwise to perform temporarily the functions provided for in this section. The new bank shall have its place of business in the same community as the closed bank.

"(9) The articles of association and the organization certificate of the new bank shall be executed by representatives designated by the corporation. No capital stock need be paid in by the corporation. The new bank shall not have a board of directors, but shall be managed by an executive officer appointed by the board of directors of the corporation and who shall be subject to its directions. In other respects such bank shall be organized in accordance with the existing provisions of the law relating to the organization of national banking associations. The new bank may, with the approval of the corporation, accept new deposits, which shall be subject to withdrawal on demand and which, except where the new bank is the only bank in the community, shall not exceed $5,000 from any depositor. The new bank, without application or approval, shall be an insured bank and shall maintain on deposit with the Federal Reserve bank of its district the reserves required by law for member banks, but shall not be required to subscribe for stock of the Federal Reserve bank. Funds of the new bank shall be kept on hand in cash, invested in securities of the Government of the United States, or in securities guaranteed as to principal and interest by the Government of the United States, or deposited with the corporation, or with a Federal Reserve bank, or, to the extent of the insurance coverage thereon, with an insured bank. The new bank, unless otherwise authorized by the Comptroller of the Currency, shall transact no business except that authorized by this section and such business as may be incidental to its organization. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, it, its franchise, property, and income shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority.

"(10) On the organization of a new bank, the corporation shall promptly make available to the new bank an amount equal to the estimated insured deposit of such closed bank plus the amount of its estimated expenses of operation and shall determine as soon as possible the amount due each depositor for his insured deposit in the closed bank, and the total expenses of operation of the new bank. Upon determination thereof, the amounts so estimated and made available shall be adjusted to conform to the amounts so determined. Earnings of the new bank shall be paid over or credited to the corporation in such adjustment. If any new bank, during the period it continues its status as such, sustains any losses with respect to which it is not effectively protected except by reason of being an insured bank, the corporation shall furnish to it additional funds in the amount of such losses. The new bank shall assume as transferred deposits the payment of the insured deposits of such closed bank to each of its depositors. Of the amount so made available, the corporation shall transfer to the new bank, in cash, such amount as is necessary to enable it to meet expenses and immediate cash demands on such transferred deposits and the remainder shall be subject to withdrawal by the new bank on demand.

"(11) When in the judgment of the board of directors it is desirable to do so, the corporation shall cause capital stock of the new bank to be offered for sale on such terms and conditions as the board of directors shall deem advisable, in an amount sufficient, in the opinion of the board of directors, to make possible the conduct of the business of the new bank on a sound basis, but in no event less than that required by section 5138 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 12, sec. 51), for the organization of a national bank in the place where such bank is located, giving the stockholders of the closed bank the first opportunity to purchase any shares of common stock so offered. Upon proof that an adequate amount of capital stock in the new bank has been subscribed and paid for in cash, the Comptroller of the Currency shall require the articles of association and the organization certificate to be amended to conform to the requirements for the organization of a national bank, and thereafter, when the requirements of law with respect to the organization of a national bank have been complied with, he shall issue to the bank a certificate of authority to commence business, which shall thereupon cease to have the status of a new bank and shall be managed by directors elected by its own shareholders and may exercise all the powers granted by law and shall be subject to all of the provisions of law relating to national banks. Such bank shall thereafter be an insured national bank, without certification to or approval by the corporation.

"(12) If the capital stock of the new bank shall not be offered for sale, or if an adequate amount of capital for such new bank is not subscribed and paid in, the board of directors may offer to transfer its business to any insured bank in the same community which will take over its assets, assume its liabilities, and pay to the corporation for such business such amount as the board of directors may deem adequate; or the board of directors in its discretion may change the location of the new bank to the office of the corporation or to some other place or may at any time wind up its affairs as herein provided. Unless the capital stock of the new bank is sold or its assets acquired and its liabilities assumed by an insured bank, as provided above, within 2 years from the date of its organization, the corporation, shall wind up its affairs, after giving such notice, if any, as the Comptroller of the Currency may require, and shall certify to the Comptroller of the Currency the termination of the new bank, and thenceforth the corporation shall be liable for its obligations and be the owner of its assets. The provisions of sections 5220 and 5221 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 12, secs. 181 and 182) shall not apply to such new banks."

13. By inserting before the said last paragraph of subsection (1) the following: "(n) (1)"; and by striking out the comma after the words "United States" in the first sentence of said paragraph and inserting before the word "except" the following: "or in securities guaranteed as to principal and interest by the Government of the United States,"; and by transposing said paragraph to subsection (n) as amended, as paragraph (1) thereof.

14. By striking out in subsection (m) the following: "(m)"; and by striking out in said subsection the word "herein" and inserting in lieu thereof "in this section"; and by transposing said subsection to subsection (n), as amended, as paragraph (2) thereof.

15. By inserting a new subsection to read as follows:

"(m) (1) The corporation as receiver of a closed national bank or District bank shall not be required to furnish bond and shall have the right to appoint an agent or agents to assist it in its duties as such receiver, and all fees, compensation, and expenses of liquidation and administration thereof shall be fixed by the corporation, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, and may be paid by it out of funds coming into its possession as such receiver. The Comptroller of the Currency is authorized and empowered to waive and relieve the corporation from complying with any regulations of the Comptroller of the Currency with respect to receiverships where in his discretion such action is deemed advisable to simplify administration.

"(2) Payment of an insured deposit to any person by the corporation shall discharge the corporation, and payment of a transferred deposit to any person by the new bank or the other insured bank shall discharge the corporation and such new bank or other insured bank, to the same extent that payment to such person by the closed bank would have discharged it from liability for the insured deposit.

"(3) Except as otherwise prescribed by the board of directors, neither the corporation, such new bank, nor such other insured bank, shall be required to recognize as the owner of any portion of a deposit appearing on the records of the closed bank under a name other than that of the claimant, any person whose name or interest as such owner is not disclosed on the records of such closed bank, or on its outstanding certificates or passbooks, as part owner of said account, where such recognition would increase the aggregate amount of the insured deposits in such closed bank.

"(4) The corporation may withhold payment of such portion of the insured deposit of any depositor in a closed bank as may be required to provide for the payment of any liability of such depositor as a stockholder of the bank, or of any liability of such depositor to the bank or its receiver, not offset against a claim due from the bank, pending the determination and payment of such liability by such depositor or any other person liable therefor.

"(5) If, after the corporation shall have given at least 3 months' notice to the depositor by mailing a copy thereof to his last known address appearing on the records of the closed bank, any depositor in a closed bank shall fail to claim his insured deposit from the corporation within 18 months after the appointment of the receiver for the closed bank, or shall fail to claim or arrange to continue the transferred deposit with the new bank or other bank assuming liability therefor within such 18 months' period, all rights of the depositor against the corporation in respect to the insured deposit or against the new bank and such other bank in respect to the transferred deposit shall be barred, and all rights of the depositor against the closed bank, its shareholders or the receivership estate to which the corporation may have become subrogated shall thereupon revert to the depositor. The amount of any transferred deposits not claimed within such 18 months' period, shall be refunded to the corporation."

16. By striking out in subsection (n) the following: "(n)" and inserting "(3)"; and by retaining said subsection in paragraph (3) of subsection (n), as amended; and by striking out in said subsection (n) the words "member banks which are now or may hereafter become insolvent or suspended" and inserting in lieu thereof "insured banks closed on account of inability to meet the demands of depositors"; and by striking out "State member" and inserting in lieu thereof "insured State"; and by striking out the period at the end of the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "or District banks"; and by adding at the end of said subsection two new sentences to read: "The corporation, in its discretion, may upon application make loans on the security of or may purchase and liquidate or sell any part of the assets of an insured bank which is now or may hereafter be closed on account of inability to meet the demands of its depositors. In any case where the corporation is acting as receiver of such insured bank such loan or purchase shall not be made without approval of a court of competent jurisdiction."; and by adding to subsection (n), as amended, a new paragraph to read as follows:

"(4) Until July 1, 1936, whenever in the judgment of the board of directors such action will reduce the risk or avert a threatened loss to the corporation and will facilitate a merger or consolidation, or facilitate the sale of the assets of an open or closed insured bank to and assumption of its liabilities by another insured bank, the corporation may, upon such terms and conditions as it may determine, make loans secured in whole or in part by assets of such open or closed insured bank, which loans may be in subordination to the rights of depositors and other creditors, or it may purchase such assets, or may guarantee any other insured bank against loss by reason of assuming the liabilities and purchasing the assets of such open or closed insured bank. Any insured national bank or District bank or, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, any receiver thereof is authorized to contract for such sales or loans and to pledge any assets of the bank to secure such loans.

17. By striking out subsection (o) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(o) (1) The corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding its notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations, in a par amount aggregating not more than three times the amount received by the corporation in payment of its capital stock and of the first annual assessments. Notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations issued under this subsection shall be redeemable at the option of the corporation before maturity in such manner as may be stipulated in such obligations, and shall bear such rate or rates of interest, and shall mature at such time or times as may be determined by the corporation: Provided, That the corporation may sell on a discount basis short-term obligations payable at maturity without interest. The notes, debentures, bonds, and other such obligations of the corporation may be secured by assets of the corporation in such manner as shall be prescribed by its board of directors. Such obligations may be offered for sale at such price or prices as the corporation may determine.

"(2) Such of the obligations authorized to be issued under this subsection, as the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may determine, shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed, both as to interest and principal, by the United States and such guaranty shall be expressed on the face thereof. In the event that the corporation shall be unable to pay upon demand, when due, principal of or interest on notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations issued by it and guaranteed by the United States under this paragraph, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the amount thereof, which is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and thereupon, to the extent of the amounts so paid, the Secretary of the Treasury shall succeed to all the rights of the holders of such notes, debentures, or other obligations.

"(3) The Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is authorized to purchase any obligations of the corporation which are guaranteed by the United States under this subsection, and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of the corporation's obligations hereunder. The Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time, sell any of the obligations of the corporation acquired by him under this subsection. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of the obligations of the corporation shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States.

"(4) The Secretary of the Treasury, at the request of the Corporation, is authorized to market for the corporation such of its notes, debentures, bonds, and other such obligations as are guaranteed by the United States under this subsection, using therefor all the facilities of the Treasury Department now authorized by law for the marketing of the obligations of the United States. The proceeds of the obligations of the corporation so marketed shall be deposited in the same manner as proceeds derived from the sale of the obligations of the United States, and the amount thereof shall be credited to the Corporation on the books of the Treasury."

18. By inserting in subsection (s) following the words "purchase any assets" the following: "or for the purpose of obtaining the payment of any insured deposit or transferred deposit or the allowance, approval, or payment of any claim."

19. By striking out in subsection (v) the following: "(v)", and inserting in lieu thereof "(v) (1)"; and by striking out in said subsection "class A stockholder of the Federal Deposit Insurance corporation" and inserting in lieu thereof "insured bank."

20. By striking out the second paragraph of subsection (v) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) Every insured bank shall display at each place of business maintained by it a sign or signs, and shall include in advertisements relating to deposits a statement to the effect that its deposits are insured by the corporation. The board of directors shall prescribe by regulation the forms of such signs and the manner of display and the forms of such statements and the manner of use. For each day an insured bank continues to violate any provision of this paragraph or any lawful provision of said regulations, it may be subject to a penalty of $100, recoverable by the corporation for its use."

21. By adding to subsection (v) five new paragraphs, to read as follows:

"(3) No insured bank shall pay any dividends on its capital stock or interest on its capital notes or debentures (if such interest is required to be paid only out of net profits) while it remains in default in the payment of any assessment due to the corporation: Provided, That if such default is due to a dispute between the insured bank and the corporation over such assessment, this paragraph shall not apply, if such bank shall deposit security satisfactory to the corporation for payment upon final determination of the issue.

"(4) Unless, in addition to compliance with other provisions of law, it shall have the prior written consent of the corporation, no insured bank shall enter into any consolidation or merger with any noninsured bank, or assume liability to pay any deposits made in any noninsured bank, or transfer assets to any noninsured bank in consideration of the assumption of liability for any portion of the deposits made in such insured bank, and no insured State nonmember bank (except a District bank) without such consent shall reduce the amount or retire any part of its common or preferred capital stock, or retire any part of its capital notes or debentures.

"(5) The corporation may require any insured bank to provide protection and indemnity against burglary, defalcation, and other similar insurable losses. Whenever any insured bank refuses to comply with any such requirement, the corporation may contract for such protection and indemnity and add the cost thereof to the assessment otherwise payable by such bank.

"(6) Whenever an insured bank, except a national bank or District bank, for a period of 120 days after written notice of the recommendations of the corporation, based on a report of examination of such bank by an examiner of the corporation, shall fail to comply with such recommendations, the corporation shall have the power, and is hereby authorized, to publish any part of such report of examination in such manner as it may determine: Provided, That such notice of intention to make such publication shall be given at the time such recommendations are made, or at any time thereafter and at least 90 days before such publication.

"(7) The board of directors shall by regulation prohibit the payment of interest on demand deposits in insured nonmember banks and for such purpose may define the term 'demand deposits', provided such exceptions from said prohibition shall be made as are now or may hereafter be prescribed with respect to deposits payable on demand in member banks by section 19 of this act, as amended, or by regulation of the Federal Reserve Board. From time to time the board of directors shall limit by regulation the rates of interest or dividends payable by insured nonmember banks on deposits other than demand deposits, provided such regulations shall be consistent with the contractual obligations of such banks to their depositors. For the purpose of fixing rates the board of directors may classify deposits according to maturities, conditions respecting receipt, withdrawal, or repayment, and may classify banks according to locations or kinds of banking business chiefly done as it may deem necessary in the public interest. It may prescribe different rates for different classes of deposits or different classes of banks, provided such different rates are reasonable when the bases for the classifications are considered. The board of directors by regulations shall define what constitutes savings deposits in an insured nonmember bank. Such regulations shall prohibit insured nonmember banks from paying deposits prior to maturity and from waiving any notice requirement with respect to withdrawal of deposits: Provided, That exceptions may be prescribed where by reason of special circumstances the prohibitions respecting withdrawal would cause unnecessary hardship to depositors and provided the prohibitions respecting withdrawal shall not apply to savings deposits. For each violation of any provision of this paragraph or any lawful provision of the Corporation's regulations relating to paying interest or dividends on deposits or to withdrawal of deposits the offending bank shall be subject to a penalty of $100, recoverable by the corporation for its use."

22. By striking out all of subsection (y) preceding the last paragraph thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) For the purposes of this section, and notwithstanding any other provision thereof, any unincorporated bank which continues to be an insured bank without application or approval under the provisions of paragraph (1) of subsection (f) of this section shall be included in the term 'State bank' and 'State nonmember bank.'"

23. By inserting at the beginning of the last paragraph of subsection (y) the following: "(2)."

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina: On page 2, line 5, after the figure 2, insert the following language:

"(b) The management of the corporation shall be vested in a board of directors consisting of five members, one of whom shall be the Comptroller of the Currency, one of whom shall be the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and three of whom shall be citizens of the United States to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. One of the appointive members shall be the chairman of the board of directors of the corporation, and not more than three of the members of such board of directors shall be members of the same political party. Each such appointive member shall hold office for a term of 6 years, and shall receive compensation at the rate of $10,000 per annum, payable monthly out of the funds of the corporation, but the Comptroller of the Currency and the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not receive additional compensation for their services as such members. The directors now serving shall continue to serve under their present appointments, and one additional director shall be appointed to make up the board of five members. And—"

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, in addressing myself to the amendment which I have just sent forward to the Clerk's desk, I shall be very brief. This same amendment, in substance, was presented by me to our committee but failed of adoption by a considerable vote. The amendment, as the language clearly indicates, is designed to increase the directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation Board from 3 to 5 members. As you know, the present Board is composed of the Comptroller of the Currency, who is an ex-officio member, and two citizens of the United States appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Under the law, this Board is nonpartisan; and in this respect it remains the same under my amendment.

I want it clearly understood that in presenting this amendment it is in nowise intended to reflect upon the present able and conscientious directorate. The present chairman, Mr. Crowley, and the Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. O'Connor, have rendered an extraordinarily splendid service to the Government and to the depositors in banks throughout the country. The work done under their direction and supervision in building up this organization will go down in history as one of the outstanding administrative achievements of our day. It is my reasoned judgment, however, that since we are making this organization permanent and adding to it increased responsibilities, the membership of the Board should be enlarged. Those who have carefully examined and studied the provisions of title I of the bill will readily see that the work of the corporation is being greatly extended and expanded and that many new problems will arise from time to time by virtue of these additional duties and responsibilities. Few governmentally operated corporations could possibly have more important tasks to perform.

I am suggesting in my amendment that the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be ex officio a member of the board and that one other citizen be appointed in the usual way. All of you understand that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been working hand in hand with officials of the Comptroller's office and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation in the rehabilitation of the capital structure of thousands of banks throughout the country, with the result that this corporation now has actually distributed and subject to distribution approximately a billion dollars invested in the capital of banks, all of which are members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. It is therefore my considered thought that the chairman of this corporation should have a voice in the formulation of the policies of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. I am satisfied in my own mind that this arrangement would bring about a closer and more interested working arrangement between the three departments and tend to provide mutual safeguards. The cost involved in this amendment would only be $10,000 and when we consider the magnitude of the corporation and the tremendous amount of finances involved it does not seem to be worthy of consideration as a factor in passing on the merits of the amendment.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Was the amendment voted down in the committee as it is now proposed?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. It is the language of the first amendment which I proposed in the committee on this phase of the bill; but if memory serves, the amendment as voted on was somewhat different.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Was the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation a member of the board in the amendment presented to the Committee?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I think that is the only change in the amendment.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Of course, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is a temporary corporation. Personally, I would not oppose an amendment to increase the board, but I did not know that the gentleman intended to have more than one ex-officio member.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I hope the prophecy of my good friend the gentleman from Maryland about the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's life will turn out to be correct; but, in view of its far-reaching ramifications and its outstanding obligations and interests, I can hardly join in his prophecy. Though I greatly hope that private organizations may soon be able to take over its active lending functions, I believe that this Corporation will be with us for many years to come. We certainly do not want to put it out of business as long as it continues to render a real service to business, and particularly the depositors in closed banks.

In conclusion, let me say that I believe it will be for the best interests of the public, the Government, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation if this amendment is adopted. It is for you to decide.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I do not suppose there has ever been an activity organized by the Government which has done such an efficient job as has the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. It has accomplished the tremendous task of creating a system of bank-deposit insurance for the banks of the United States, and it has done it in a rapid and efficient way. That board consists of three members. We are asked by this amendment to increase it to four. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] has said that no board in the Government has a greater responsibility. I agree thoroughly with that statement. They have a tremendous responsibility, and by the terms of this bill we are tremendously increasing that responsibility. It seems to me that the splendid manner in which they have met these responsibilities and carried on their work would indicate that it is not exactly in keeping with courteous appreciation or good policy to alter the situation now and increase or diminish the membership of the board. I believe the board is entitled to the support of the Members of this House for the splendid job they have done. The Member who offered the amendment admits the fact that it has done good work. That being so, why should we make any changes in the present set-up? I do not believe that a board of five could or would do any better than a board of three. It seems to me that with a board of five there would be more differences of opinion to be composed whenever they got together. In view of the great success with which they have operated in the past, I think it is the part of wisdom on the part of this House to keep the membership at three to permit it to continue to function in the future as it has in the past.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina) there were—ayes 8, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE II—AMENDMENTS TO THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT

SEC. 201. (a) Section 4 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is further amended by striking out the paragraph which commences with the words "Class C directors shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board" and the next succeeding paragraph, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Class C directors shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board. They shall have been for at least 2 years residents of the districts for which they are appointed, except that this requirement shall not apply to the governor and vice governor of the bank. Each class C director shall hold office for a term of 3 years except that the governor's term as a class C director shall expire when he ceases to be Governor of the bank and, if the vice governor be designated as a class C director, his term as a class C director shall expire when he ceases to be vice governor. One of the directors of class C shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board as deputy chairman to exercise the powers of the chairman of the board when necessary. In the case of the absence of the chairman and deputy chairman, the third class C director shall preside at meetings of the Board.

"Effective 90 days after the enactment of the Banking Act of 1935, the offices of governor and chairman of the board of directors of each Federal Reserve bank shall be combined. The governor shall be the chief executive officer of the bank and shall be appointed annually by the board of directors. His first appointment shall be subject to the approval of the Federal Reserve Board. He shall not take office until approved by the Federal Reserve Board and thereupon he shall become a class C director of the bank for the unexpired portion of the term held by his predecessor as chairman of the board of directors or, if such term was completed, then for the next regular term of 3 years. At the expiration of such term as a class C director, and of each term of 3 years thereafter, his continuance in office shall be subject to the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, and he shall cease to be governor at the expiration of any such term unless his reappointment be approved by the Federal Reserve Board. Upon such approval he shall become a class C director for the ensuing term of 3 years. He shall be ex-officio chairman of the board of directors and chairman of the executive committee; and all other officers and employees of the bank shall be directly responsible to him. For each Federal Reserve bank there shall be appointed annually in the same manner as the governor, a vice governor, who shall, in the absence or disability of the governor or during a vacancy in the office of governor, serve as the chief executive officer of the bank and act as chairman of the executive committee of the bank. His appointment and reappointment shall be subject to approval by the Federal Reserve Board in the same manner as that of the governor. He may be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board as a class C director of the bank and, in such case, may be appointed as deputy chairman of the board of directors. Whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of the governor or vice governor of a Federal Reserve bank, it shall be filled in the manner provided for original appointments; and the person so appointed shall hold office until the expiration of the term of his predecessor.

"Effective 90 days after the enactment of the Banking Act of 1935, any Federal Reserve agent who shall not have been appointed governor of the bank shall cease to be a class C director and chairman of the board of directors. All duties prescribed by law for the Federal Reserve agent shall be performed by the governor of the bank or by such other person or persons as he shall designate.

"No member of the board of directors of a Federal Reserve bank, other than the governor and vice governor, shall serve as a director for more than two consecutive terms of 3 years each, but nothing in this paragraph shall prevent the present incumbents from serving out the remainders of their present terms."

(b) The last paragraph of such section 4 is amended by striking out the words "Thereafter every director of a Federal Reserve bank chosen as hereinbefore provided shall hold office for a term of 3 years" and substituting the words "Thereafter each director of class A and each director of class B chosen as hereinbefore provided shall hold office for a term of 3 years."

(c) The paragraph of such section 4 which commences with the words "Such board of directors shall be selected" is amended by striking therefrom the words "holding office for 3 years, and."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLLISTER: Page 44, line 25, after the word "directors", strike out the rest of that line and all on page 45, through the word "years" in line 14; also the words "and reappointment" in line 23.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, in this amendment I am attempting to strike out that provision which gives to the Federal Reserve Board the right to approve those who are appointed as governors of the various Federal Reserve banks; that is, their chief executive officers. At the present time the governors of the Federal Reserve banks are appointed by their boards of directors. Those boards of directors are appointed, 6 by the member banks whose money has gone into the investment in the capital stock of the banks, and 3 by the Federal Reserve Board. Each board of directors of nine elects a governor, who is the chief executive officer of that bank.

There is no provision in the law at the present time for this office of governor. It has merely grown up to be the usage that the board of directors of the bank, as the board of directors of any other corporation, has the right to appoint a man who shall be the chief executive officer of the bank and perform the usual functions of such individual. This amendment which I suggest will take out of the bill the change which is put in, which gives to the Federal Reserve Board the right practically to dictate to the Federal Reserve bank who shall be its governor or chief executive officer.

I consider this the first of the dangerous steps which this bill contains, because by this the Federal Reserve Board, which is in turn largely controlled by the Executive, will have much greater powers over the operation of the Federal Reserve banks than it has today.

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. Would the gentleman's amendment restore the law as it is now?

Mr. HOLLISTER. It will not, but I shall be very glad to restore the law that way if the gentleman desires to offer such an amendment.

Mr. REILLY. Under the gentleman's amendment, would there still be a governor and an agent?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The governor and the agent and the chairman would all be combined under my amendment.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I will be glad to yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. STEAGALL. In other words, the gentleman would take out of existing law all the powers that the Federal Reserve Board possesses with reference to the governor or chairman of the board of a Federal Reserve bank?

Mr. HOLLISTER. It was stated to us in committee by Governor Eccles that the chief reason for this change was because of the fact that there was somewhat of a conflict between the duties of the chairman of the board appointed by the Federal Reserve Board and the governor appointed by the directors. The object of the changes in the bill was chiefly to combine those two functions. Under the amendment I have suggested those two functions would be still combined.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Who would select the governor—the board of directors?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The board of directors.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. And the Federal Reserve Board would only have approval?

Mr. HOLLISTER. They would not have approval under my amendment.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. But they would under the new bill?

Mr. HOLLISTER. They would under the new bill.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The only difference, then, is that they would have approval and now they do not?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The new bill would make it impossible for the board of directors to designate whomsoever they wished. It would still have to be approved by the Federal Reserve Board at Washington.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. But the directors can select the governor.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The directors can select the governor, subject to approval.

It would be unwise to bring about a situation whereby the board of directors, who are trying their best to conduct the affairs of the regional bank, would be in such position that they might have to take whomsoever the Federal Reserve Board might select. By the right which the Federal Reserve Board has to veto the selection of any governor by the directors of the regional bank, the directors would be compelled to accept only someone who was satisfactory to the Federal Reserve Board. As I have stated, this is the first of a series of steps which increases greatly the power of the Federal Reserve Board over the Federal Reserve banks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I think it should be understood that under the original Federal Reserve law the Federal Reserve Board was empowered to name the chairman of the board of each Federal Reserve bank to be its executive officer. There grew up a practice by which each of the banks selected a governor, who was the executive officer, and the practice has become a general rule. This bill would surrender the right of the Federal Reserve Board to name the chairmen of the boards of directors of the Federal Reserve banks, and would validate the practice that has grown up of permitting each bank to select a governor to be executive officer; but under this bill a governor selected by the Federal Reserve bank would be subject to approval of the Federal Reserve Board. That is all the power they will have over the governor, under the bill before the House.

I cannot feel that it is the desire of Members who have kept fully abreast of the developments of this legislation to have any further surrender of authority over these banks on the part of the Federal Reserve Board. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOLLISTER) there were—ayes 32, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 202. Section 9 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by inserting after the tenth paragraph thereof the following new paragraph:

"Upon application to the Federal Reserve Board by any non-member bank which at the time of such application has been admitted to the benefits of insurance by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation under section 12-B of this act, the Federal Reserve Board, in its discretion, in order to facilitate the admission of such bank to membership in the Federal Reserve System, may waive in whole or in part the requirements of this section relating to the admission of such bank to membership: Provided, That if such bank is admitted with a capital less than that required for the organization of a national bank in the same place and its capital and surplus are not, in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board, adequate in relation to its liabilities to depositors and other creditors, the Federal Reserve Board may, in its discretion, require such bank to increase its capital and surplus to such amount as the Board may deem necessary within such period prescribed by the Board as in its judgment shall be reasonable in view of all the circumstances: Provided, however, That no such bank shall be required to increase its capital to an amount in excess of that required for the organization of a national bank in the same place."

SEC. 203. Section 10 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is further amended in the following respects:

(1) By striking out the second sentence of the first paragraph and substituting the following: "In selecting the six appointive members of the Federal Reserve Board the President shall choose persons well qualified by education or experience or both to participate in the formulation of national economic and monetary policies. Not more than one of the appointive members shall be selected from any one Federal Reserve district, except that this limitation shall not apply to the selection of the governor."

(2) By adding, at the end of such first paragraph the following: "Each appointive member of the Federal Reserve Board heretofore appointed may retire from service upon reaching the age of 70 or at any time thereafter, and all members hereafter appointed shall retire upon reaching the age of 70. Each member of the Board so retired from service who shall have served for as long as 12 years shall, during the remainder of his life, receive an annual retirement pay in an amount equal to his annual salary at the time of retirement: Provided, That, if he shall have served for as long as 5 years but less than 12 years, his annual retirement pay shall be at the rate of one-twelfth of such annual salary for each year served and for any fraction of an additional year of such service: Provided further, That any member whose term expires and who is not reappointed shall receive retirement pay upon the same basis as if he had been retired under the provisions of this paragraph, except that, if his term expire before he reaches the age of 65 and he be offered and decline to accept reappointment, he shall not receive any retirement pay. The funds necessary for such retirement pay shall be provided by the Federal Reserve banks in such manner as the Federal Reserve Board shall prescribe. Nothing in this section shall prevent the President from reappointing any member of the Federal Reserve Board holding office on July 1, 1935.

(3) By striking out the fourth sentence of the second paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Of the 6 appointive members of the Board, 1 shall be designated by the President as governor and 1 as vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board, to serve as such until the further order of the President, and the provisions of the next preceding sentence of this paragraph shall not apply to the member designated as governor. If the governor's designation as such be terminated, he may continue to serve as a member of the Board for the remainder of his term as such; but, if he resign within 90 days from the date of the termination of his designation as governor, he shall not be subject thereafter to any restriction of this section with respect to holding any office, position, or employment in any member bank."

(4) By adding at the end of the second paragraph the following: "Upon the expiration of their terms of office, members of the Federal Reserve Board shall continue to serve until their successors are appointed and have qualified."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLLISTER: Page 48, line 13, after the word "persons", strike out the rest of the sentence and insert "who have had adequate training and experience in banking."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, section 203, to which I now suggest an amendment, reads that in selecting the six appointive members of the Federal Reserve Board the President shall choose persons well qualified by education or experience or both to participate in the formulation of national economic and monetary policies.

My amendment is that in selecting the six appointive members of the Board they shall be persons who have had training and experience in banking.

We are discussing the subject of banking. This is a bill which deals with banking. The Federal Reserve Board is set up as a supervisory board over the operation of the various Federal Reserve banks which, in turn, are made up of members of the Federal Reserve System in each particular district. The question here presented is whether we want the Federal Reserve Board, the advisory board to which, incidentally, this bill gives much greater powers than it ever had before, whether we want that Board to be made up of a lot of theorists on the subject of economics or of men who have had some experience in banking. As the bill now reads, they may be persons well qualified by education or experience to participate in the formulation of national economic and monetary policies. Do we want the Federal Reserve Board to be made up of people qualified solely by education, perhaps, with no training whatsoever, no experience; or do we want people who have had some experience in the various problems which they are to attempt to solve? Secondly, irrespective of the disjunctive, the word "or", which certainly should not be there, do we want to define the nature of the appointment to include such broad terms as "the formulation of economic policies" as well as "monetary policies"? Are we not perhaps embarking the Federal Reserve Board on a sea on which it was never expected to sail, and on a sea which is highly dangerous? After all, this is a board, as I have stated, to supervise the central banking system of the country. This is not a planning board to discuss economic planning, to discuss the more abundant life, to consider what high social measures might perhaps be adopted to make this country a better place in which to live. This is a board to supervise the central banking system of the country, the credit system, the lifeblood of the country. We should fill it with men who have had banking experience and not with a lot of theorists on the subject of economics.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does not the gentleman think any provision in this piece of legislation as to qualifications may be superfluous and of no effect for the reason that it is not usual to put such descriptions in legislation? Suppose the appointing power does not follow them, what can be done about it?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I agree with the gentleman on that. It should not be in the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It should not be in the bill at all.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Exactly; and if the gentleman will move to strike it out I will support his motion. If the language is to stay in the bill, however, it should be so modified as to prevent the appointment of a lot of professors who do not know the first thing about the practical end of banking.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. What does the gentleman mean by education?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I wish I could tell the gentleman what education is.

Mr. McCORMACK. Suppose a young man started in a bank at 14, 15, or 16 years of age; denied a college education, but working in the bank for many years he has educated himself and has acquired valuable experience. There are many such men in the United States. My question is whether or not such a man would not be precluded from appointment by the requirements of education and experience.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I agree such requirements should not be in the bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. If the word "education" is retained in the bill the quantum of education must be determined by someone and probably will be construed as meaning that the man should have a college education. If such were the case this young man I have used as an example would be precluded although he was thoroughly qualified otherwise.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I think the gentleman is correct. I think experience should be sufficient. If the gentleman desires to modify my amendment in this respect, I will be glad to accept the modification.

Mr. McCORMACK. When the gentleman says "education and experience", he has not remedied the situation. As a matter of fact the language of the bill "education or experience" gives greater latitude in qualifying.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I believe the language of my amendment is sufficient.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am afraid it may not be construed as the gentleman anticipates.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, this whole issue was fought out from every angle when the original Federal Reserve Act was adopted. In my remarks in the House last week I quoted from the book of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], in which he recited the conferences with the President of the United States at the time the original Federal Reserve Act was under preparation. It will be remembered that in that conversation the President of the United States insisted that the Federal Reserve Board was to represent the people of the Nation, the national welfare, as distinguished from any particular class, and that a requirement that bankers be included on the Board was undesirable and contrary to the purposes of the act. The language of the existing law requires that regard in the appointment of the Federal Reserve Board shall be paid to a fair representation of the financial, agricultural, industrial, and commercial interests and geographical divisions of the country. The bill under consideration would depart even from those broad directions and base the appointment of the Federal Reserve Board upon experience or education as qualifications for the proper exercise of sound judgment in the establishment of national economic and monetary policies.

Under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio every man on the Board would have to be a banker, and we would have complete banker control not only of each of the 12 Federal Reserve banks, two-thirds of the members of which are elected by bankers, but complete banker control of the Federal Reserve Board itself. All the interests of the public would be intrusted to officials made up of bankers selected by bankers, with no representation of any other class.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] strikes at the very heart of the fundamental purpose of this legislation.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HOLLISTER. May I point out to the gentleman the discussion in reference to the word "education", and I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] to the fact that the amendment which I suggested did not use the word "education." It uses the words "training and experience", which I think will satisfy the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman's amendment did not limit the language to "training and experience", but said in effect "training and experience in banking", which means that the Federal Reserve Board as well as all 12 banks would be absolutely under the control of bankers.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman feel that the primary qualifications for membership on this Board ought to be ignorance of banking?

Mr. STEAGALL. No. There is nothing in the bill to prevent the President from selecting men trained in banking, if he sees fit. But, on the other hand, it does not restrict him to the appointment of bankers which would mean banker control of the Federal Reserve Board and of the entire system. The gentleman's amendment would nullify the chief purpose of the act.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MARTIN of Colorado: Page 48, line 14, preceding the word "experience", strike out the word "or" and insert "and"; and following the word "experience" in line 14, strike out the words "or both."

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to take 5 minutes in a discussion of this amendment. The other day I fell under the influence of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER], when he discussed this provision, to the extent of feeling that at least one conjunction ought to be changed, which was from "or" to "and." I asked the gentleman at that time whether he would offer an amendment to that effect, and he stated he would have so many more important amendments to offer he might not offer an amendment on this point. However, he did offer an amendment today, but it was very much broader than the amendment I have just offered, because he limited the eligibles to bankers.

I feel that perhaps it would not be asking too much that a man should have both education and experience. His education might be limited and his experience large, or vice versa. I thought I would make that much of a concession at least to the gentleman from Ohio by offering an amendment which would require that a man for such an important position should have both an education and experience along the lines required; that is to say, in national economics and monetary policies; so that it could not be claimed that some braintruster who never had any experience whatever but a vast amount of university culture and theory could be selected for membership on this highly important board.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Colorado) there were—ayes 20, nays 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HOLLISTER: On page 49, line 44, after the word "Board", strike out the words "to serve as such until the further order of the President."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, this is the second of the points to which I object, particularly as being a cumulative increase in power, first, the power of the Federal Reserve Board over the operation of the Federal Reserve banks, and now an increase in the power of the Chief Executive over the Federal Reserve Board. I am pointing this out because it is one of a series of steps.

The wording which I ask to be stricken out of this bill is that wording which makes the appointment of the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and his continuation in office, solely at the will of the President. The law at the present time is to the effect that of the membership of the Board one shall be designated by the President as Governor. It has been stated by a number of representatives of the Federal Reserve Board that at the present time the President has full right to remove the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board at will. The only answer that can be made to that is, that if that is so, why are we asked to state specifically in this bill that the President shall have that right? There has been no attempt made by any President to remove a Governor. There has been no suggestion that he has this right, and if it is true that this bill makes no change whatsoever in existing law, then there can be no harm whatsoever on striking this provision from the bill.

Mr. Chairman, may I point out to the members of the committee that of the Federal Reserve Board of eight, at the present time, the President has the appointment of the Governor and the Vice Governor. There is also the Secretary of the Treasury, who is, of course, an appointee of the President, serving ex officio. There is also the Comptroller of the Treasury, who is generally considered an administration man, serving ex officio. If it is stated specifically that the President has the right of removal of the Governor and Vice Governor, it really puts in his hands the control of 4 out of 8 members of the Federal Reserve Board, and when we increase, as we are asked to do in this bill, the power of the Federal Reserve Board over not only the executive operation of the Federal Reserve banks, but also over various functions of the banks with respect to credit, then I say we are enormously increasing the possible executive power over the whole banking structure of the country, as well as the credit system.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Does the gentleman think it is wise to leave the law in an uncertain condition? By the gentleman's statement he has indicated that he thinks it is an uncertain condition at the present time.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I would, of course, prefer to have it understood that the Governor was not removable.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Does not the gentleman think the matter would be set forth clearly if his amendment was that the President should not have the right?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I know there are a number of gentlemen on that side who have some thoughts along this line. If they have amendments which they think would cover this situation better than my amendment, I suggest that they offer their amendments. I am objecting to the existing language in the bill. I know there is little chance of getting in a further provision of that kind.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I am such a warm admirer of the gentleman's ability as a legislator that I think his amendment ought to be in proper form instead of indefinite form as it is.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I thank the gentleman for the compliment, and the gentleman will at least go a certain distance with me if he will accept my amendment to take out the language I suggest.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. No; I do not want it to be uncertain.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOLLISTER) there were—ayes 30, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ENGEL: Page 48, line 19, strike out subsection (2) of section 203.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, section 203 (2), which I would strike from the bill, provides that a pension be paid to the members of the Federal Reserve Board after having served 5 years or more, the amount of such pension varying from $5,000 a year paid to a member who has served 5 years and increasing automatically at the rate of $1,000 for each year additional service until the sum of $12,000 a year is reached after such member served 12 years. The committee report attempts to justify the payment of such pension in the following language:

This amendment is for the purpose of making the members of the Board more independent by eliminating the possibility of their official actions being influenced by the necessity of seeking positions in the banking world after the expiration of their terms as members of the Board if they are not reappointed.

In other words, in order to prevent a member of this Board from granting special favors to certain banks with the hope of getting a job, they are going to pension him for the rest of his life. Any man who is subject to pressure of this kind is not fit to sit upon the Board and should not be appointed. Remember, we are appointing six men who are expected to be experts in their field who must be financiers—men who have had enough banking experience to be able to run successfully the entire banking system of the United States. If these men are successful men—as they should be—they should not, and do not, need this pension. If a man during his entire lifetime, including the 12 years' service on the Board, for which he has been paid a total sum by the Government of $144,000, has not accumulated sufficient assets to make him independent without depending upon a pension for a livelihood, then he cannot be such a successful business man as would qualify him to sit upon this Board.

Assuming a man under this section were appointed at the age of 32 years (William Jennings Bryan was candidate for President at 35), and that man served 12 years at $12,000 a year, receiving a total of $144,000, and then were pensioned at $12,000 a year; assume further that he lives until the age of 74 (a possible and a probable case), he would then have received from the Government more than one-half million dollars—to be exact, $504,000 for that 12 years' service. Again assuming a man were appointed at 32 years of age to fill a vacancy, served 5 years at $12,000 a year, and were not offered reappointment, and lived to the age of 74, that man would have received $60,000 for the 5 years' service and $185,000 for the 37 years' pension at $5,000 a year, or a total of $235,000 for 5 years' service.

On Tuesday the gentleman from Maryland graciously yielded to me for a question on this subject. When I timidly ventured the statement during the discussion of this problem that I was thinking of the other fellow down the line to whom we expected to pay a pension of $15 a month, the gentleman from Maryland said that I made a demagogic statement; in other words, he charged me with being a demagogue. If advocating a proposition which would pay to these financiers, after 12 years' service at $12,000 a year, a pension of $12,000 a year, making it possible for one of these men to receive more than one-half million dollars in cash for his 12 years' service—I repeat, sir, if advocating such a proposition makes the gentleman from Maryland a statesman, he is welcome to be called such. If, on the other hand, the mere fact that I ventured to express a thought for the great mass of people to whom we expect to pay $15 a month under this old-age-pension law; if a thought of them makes me a demagogue, I am proud of the name. If trying to speak a word for these poor people, who, like Lazarus, are hoping that a few financial crumbs may fall from the table of Dives; if, sir, thinking about them makes me a demagogue, I glory in the name.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. Yes.

Mr. FORD of California. Is it the gentleman's understanding that the Government pays this pension?

Mr. ENGEL. The Federal Reserve bank pays it.

Mr. FORD of California. And it does not come out of the Government.

Mr. ENGEL. But why should they be paid this money?

Mr. FORD of California. But the fact is that the Government does not pay it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. In answer to the gentleman from California let me say that this comes out of profits made by the use of the credit of the Government of the United States, so that indirectly it does come out of the profits of the Government of the United States.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, to me the very idea of offering a man who is qualified to operate the banking system of the United States a pension is an absurdity.

A few weeks ago, 253 Democrats voted down a Republican proposition—only 1 Republican voted with the Democrats—to increase the amount paid under the old-age-pension law from $15 to $20 a month. I am giving these 253 Members an opportunity to vote to eliminate a proposition which gives these financiers from $5,000 to $12,000 a year pension after having served from 5 to 12 years at $12,000 a year. I am wondering whether these 253 Democrats who voted down this $5 increase in the old-age-pension law will now vote to retain a $12,000 pension to be paid these financiers as provided in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ENGEL) there were—ayes 48, noes 52.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. STEAGALL and Mr. ENGEL.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 92, noes 81.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 204. (a) Subsection (1) of section 11 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by adding the following at the end thereof: "The Board may assign to designated members of the Board or officers or representatives of the Board, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Board, the performance of any of its duties, functions, or services; but any such assignment shall not include the determination of any national or system policy or any power to make rules and regulations or any power which under the terms of this act is required to be exercised by a specified number of members of the Board."

(b) Section 11 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection as follows:

"(c) It shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to exercise such powers as it possesses in such manner as to promote conditions conducive to business stability and to mitigate by its influence unstabilizing fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action and credit administration."

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH: On page 51, strike out everything from lines 4 to 10, inclusive, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"(c) It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the average purchasing power of the dollar as ascertained by the Department of Labor in the wholesale commodity markets for the period covering the years 1921 to 1929, inclusive, shall be promptly restored; and that after such restoration shall have been achieved, the purchasing power of the dollar shall be maintained substantially stable in relation to a suitable index of basic commodity prices which the Federal Reserve Board shall cause to be compiled and published in complete detail at weekly intervals."

"The Federal Reserve Board, the Federal Reserve banks, and the Secretary of the Treasury are hereby charged with the duty of making effective this policy. To this end it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to establish or cause to be established in the United States a free and open market in which gold and silver may be bought and sold for use, investment, or trade, and to determine, without limitations, and with the advice of the Federal Reserve Board, the amounts and the prices at which the Treasury shall buy and sell gold and silver."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WEAVER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct the attention of Members to the question of constitutionality which has been raised in connection with this legislation.

In his remarks before the House of Representatives on May 4, 1935, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE] expressed the opinion that section 205 of the Banking Act of 1935, H. R. 7617, is unconstitutional for the reason that the bill contains a delegation by Congress of its legislative power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, that the bill does not state any policy or standard to guide or limit the Board in exercising such power, and that, therefore, the attempted delegation of authority is invalid.

This contention is completely refuted by section 204 (b) of the bill which declares that it is the policy of Congress that the Federal Reserve Board shall exercise its monetary powers in such manner as to promote conditions conducive to business stability and to mitigate unstabilizing fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment. This statement constitutes a guiding principle and merely leaves to the Federal Reserve Board the administration of the policy of Congress and the application of such policy to such conditions as may arise from time to time. An examination of the decided cases on this point shows that the guiding principle stated in this bill is much more definite than those contained in similar grants of authority to the executive branch of the Government which have been upheld by the Supreme Court.

The recent decision in Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan (293 U. S. 388), the so-called "hot oil case", is readily distinguishable on the ground that Congress stated no policy or standard whatever to guide or limit the President in exercising the power granted, but instead left to the Executive absolute discretion as to whether or not the prohibitions of the act should be put into effect. It is interesting to note that all of the cases cited by the Supreme Court in the "hot oil" case were cases in which the Supreme Court had upheld the constitutionality of laws granting authority to the executive branch of the Government.

A reading of the hearings before the House Banking and Currency Committee discloses that the specific provision of the bill which Mr. SPENCE regards as containing an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power is section 205, which relates to the open-market operations of the Federal Reserve System. Mr. SPENCE infers that the bill contains some new delegation of legislative power not found in the Federal Reserve Act as it now exists. It is submitted, however, that an examination of the existing law and of the provisions of section 205 of the bill will clearly demonstrate that there is no delegation in the bill different in principle from that now contained in the present law and that the only change is in the group to which the power is delegated.

Under the provisions of section 12 (a) of the existing Federal Reserve Act, the open-market operations of the System are vested in the Federal Open Market Committee, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Federal Reserve banks. Section 205 of the proposed bill would give the Federal Reserve Board complete control over the open-market operations of the System except for the requirement that the Board must consult the Open Market Advisory Committee before making any change in open-market policy. Thus it may be seen that there is no change in the power granted but merely a change in the group to which it is delegated.

Accordingly, it seems that Mr. SPENCE's charge of unconstitutionality should be directed against the existing Federal Reserve Act rather than against the proposed banking act. In this connection, however, it should be observed that open-market operations of the Federal Reserve System constitute only 1 of 3 instruments of credit control exercised by that body, the other 2 being the power to fix discount rates and to establish reserve requirements. The grant of the first two of these powers has been held constitutional in the case of Raichle v. Federal Reserve Bank of New York (34 Fed. (2d) 910 (C. C. A. 2d, 1929)).

The only guiding principle stated in the existing Federal Reserve Act is that certain action shall be taken "with a view of accommodating commerce and business." Since the statement of objectives contained in the proposed banking act is much more definite and comprehensive than the statement in the existing law, the enactment of the bill would render the constitutionality of the grant of power to control open-market operations, fix the discount rate, and establish reserve requirements even clearer than it is in the existing law.

In his attack on the constitutionality of section 205 of the bill, Mr. SPENCE ignores the fundamental question at issue, namely, whether the statement of policy in section 204 (b) of the bill is sufficiently definite and comprehensive in the light of the decisions of the Supreme Court passing upon similar questions. Mr. SPENCE apparently places considerable reliance upon the "hot oil" case—Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan (293 U. S. 388)—which he states is "right in point." The most casual reading of that case discloses that the Supreme Court found that nowhere in the statute under consideration had Congress declared or indicated any policy or standard to guide or limit the President in exercising the delegated powers. In this connection the Court stated:

The Congress left the matter to the President without standard or rule to be dealt with as he pleased.

The situation existing in that case is readily distinguishable from that presented by the proposed banking act which contains a clear and definite statement of objective. In this connection, it is respectfully suggested that the cursory manner in which Mr. SPENCE passes over the statement of policy in section 204 (b) of the bill may indicate that his objection to the bill is not actually based upon the absence of a guiding principle but instead upon a preference for some other guiding principle.

Another point of distinction between the bill and the statute involved in the "hot oil" case is the kind of power delegated. In that case Congress granted to the President power to prohibit the shipment in interstate commerce of oil produced in violation of State quotas and attached criminal penalties to violations of the President's orders. But the power granted by the proposed banking act is merely a power to control the purchase and sales by Federal Reserve banks of certain securities. Although such transactions may have an influence upon the volume and cost of credit they are not matters over which Congress ordinarily exercises control. In the statute involved in the "hot oil" case the President could determine whether or not the prohibition would be effective at all, whereas in this bill the only power granted is that to control a function which the Reserve banks have exercised since their organization.

A review of the leading cases decided by the Supreme Court upon this question shows conclusively that the guiding principle stated in the bill is much more complete and definite than the statements which have previously been held to be sufficient.

In Field v. Clark (143 U. S. 649), the Court considered a statute authorizing the President to suspend the free introduction of certain articles into the United States "when- ever, and so often as the President shall be satisfied" that the governments producing them imposed duties which in view of the free list established by the act, the President "may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable."

The court upheld the statute and stated that the only discretion granted to the President related to the enforcement of the policy established by Congress.

In the above case the only principle for the guidance of the President was whether the duties were "unequal and unreasonable." These words do not express anything like as definite a principle as that contained in section 204 (b) of the bill which directs the Board to promote business stability and to mitigate unstabilizing fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment.

In Buttfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S. 470), the Court upheld an act which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to "establish uniform standards of purity, quality, and fitness for the consumption of all kinds of teas imported into the United States." In its opinion, the Court said:

This in effect was the fixing of a primary standard, and devolved upon the Secretary of the Treasury the mere executive duty to effectuate the legislative policy declared in the statute. * * * Congress legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably practicable, and from the necessities of the case was compelled to leave to executive officials the duty of bringing about the result pointed out by the statute. To deny the power of Congress to delegate such a duty would, in effect, amount but to declaring that the plenary power vested in Congress to regulate foreign commerce could not be efficaciously exerted.

Certainly the direction to "establish uniform standards of purity, quality, and fitness" for tea is no more definite than the direction to mitigate unstabilizing fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment. The statement of the Court that Congress legislated on the subject "as far as was reasonably practicable" is especially significant in the present situation. It is submitted that it would be no more feasible for Congress to attempt to lay down specific and detailed directions as to the course to be followed by the Federal Reserve Board in exercising credit control than it would be for Congress to enact specific and detailed standards of purity, quality and fitness for tea.

The statute upheld in United States v. Grimaud (220 U. S. 506) authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to "make such rules and regulations and establish such service as will insure the objects of such reservation, namely, to regulate their occupancy and use and to preserve the forests thereon from destruction; and any violation of the provisions of this act or such rules and regulations shall be punished", as provided in other sections. In upholding this statute against the charge that it constituted an unlawful delegation of legislative power, the Court made the following statement:

From the beginning of the Government various acts have been passed conferring upon executive officers power to make rules and regulations—not for the government of their departments but for administering the laws which did govern. None of these statutes could confer legislative power. But when Congress had legislated and indicated its will, it could give to those who were to act under such general provisions "power to fill up the details."

The cases upholding the grant of authority to the Secretary of War to determine whether bridges constitute unreasonable obstructions to navigation illustrate the extent to which the courts have gone in upholding the sufficiency of statements of policy for the guidance of the executive branch of the Government. The only principle for the guidance of the Secretary of War is that he "shall have reason to believe" that any bridge "is an unreasonable obstruction to the free navigation of such waters." Union Bridge Company v. United States (204 U. S. 364). Likewise, the grant of authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce reasonable rates is accompanied by a statement of policy much less specific than that contained in the proposed Banking Act. The principle established for the guidance of the Interstate Commerce Commission is that rates shall be just and reasonable considering the service given, and not discriminatory. The Supreme Court, however, has repeatedly upheld the validity of the Interstate Commerce Act against charges that it contained an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. St. Louis & Iron Mountain Railway v. Taylor (210 U. S. 281); Intermountain Rate Cases (234 U. S. 476).

It is respectfully submitted that the guiding principle stated in the banking bill is fully as definite and comprehensive as any of the above statements of principle and, accordingly, that the grant of power in the bill is in accord with the principles of the Constitution as construed by the Supreme Court.

A reading of the hearings before the House Banking and Currency Committee discloses that the specific provision of the bill which Mr. SPENCE regards as containing an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power is section 205, which relates to the open-market operations of the Federal Reserve System. In referring to such section at the hearings, Mr. SPENCE several times uses the word "new", apparently to convey the impression that the bill contains some new delegation of legislative power not found in the Federal Reserve Act as it now exists. However, an examination of the existing law and of the provisions of section 205 of the bill clearly demonstrates that there is no grant of power in the bill different in principle from that now contained in the present law and that the only change is in the group to which the power is granted.

Under the provisions of section 12 (a) of the existing Federal Reserve Act, as interpreted by the Board's regulation M, the open-market operations of the Federal Reserve System must be initiated by the Federal Open Market Committee through a recommendation of a particular open-market policy to the Federal Reserve Board. Such a recommendation becomes effective only when and to the extent that it is approved by the Board. When an open-market operation has been recommended by the Federal Open Market Committee and approved by the Federal Reserve Board, each Federal Reserve bank then has the right to decide whether or not it will participate in such operation. As will be seen, the above arrangement constitutes a grant of the power to carry on open-market operations to three different groups. Although the Federal Reserve Board does not have exclusive control of open-market operations under existing law, it nevertheless does have such control that no open-market operation can be carried on without its approval.

Under the provisions of section 205 of the proposed bill, the Federal Reserve Board would have complete control over the open-market operations of the Federal Reserve System with one qualification, that the Board must consult the Open Market Advisory Committee, consisting of five representatives of the Federal Reserve banks, before making any change on its own initiative in the open-market policy. It thus appears that the power to engage in open-market operations is changed from the Federal Reserve Board and two other groups to the Federal Reserve Board alone. If this can properly be called a delegation of legislative power, it certainly cannot be called a new or different delegation. Accordingly, it seems that Mr. SPENCE's charge of unconstitutionality should be directed against the existing Federal Reserve Act rather than against the proposed banking act which embodies no change from the existing law in the amount or kind of power delegated.

It should be observed that the open-market operations of the Federal Reserve System constitute only one of three instruments of credit control exercised by that body. The Board's power to fix discount rates and its power to establish reserve requirements are also important instruments of credit policy. The case of Raichle v. Federal Reserve Bank of New York (34 Fed. (2d) 910 (C. C. A. 2d, 1929)) brings out clearly the relation of control of open-market operations and the fixing of the discount rate as instruments of credit control and upholds the constitutionality of the grant of these powers to the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. In that case the plaintiff sought to restrain the Federal Reserve Bank of New York from engaging in open-market operations and raising the discount rate on the ground that such action by the bank was an unlawful violation of plaintiff's rights. The court dismissed plaintiff's bill and held that the action of the Federal Reserve bank was lawful. In its opinion, the court stated:

The foregoing provisions enable the Federal Reserve banks, without waiting for applications from their member banks for loans or rediscounts, to adjust the general credit situation by purchasing and selling in the open market the class of securities that they are permitted to deal in. The power "to establish from time to time, subject to review and determination of the Federal Reserve Board, rates of discount to be charged by the Federal Reserve bank", appears in the act (12 U. S. C. A., sec. 357) with the open-market powers. The two powers are correlative and enable the Federal Reserve banks to make their rediscount rates effective.

Certainly it was lawful to engage in open-market transactions by the sale of securities, to fix the rediscount rate, and to decline to rediscount eligible paper. Purchases and sales in the open market are specifically authorized by the act.

With regard to the constitutionality of the Federal Reserve bank's power to fix the discount rate, the court said:

While it is alleged in the bill that the rediscount rate "has been arbitrarily and unreasonably raised", it was for the defendant, subject to the supervision of the Federal Reserve Board, to determine what would be a reasonable rediscount. It is not contended that the provision for fixing rates of discount is unconstitutional, nor would it seem even reasonable to argue that it is, after such decisions as First National Bank v. Fellows ex rel. Union Trust Co. (244 U. S. 416, 37 S. Ct. 734, 61 L. Ed. 1233, L. R. A. 1918C, 283, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 1169), and Westfall v. United States (274 U. S. 256, 47 S. Ct. 629, 71 L. Ed. 1036), as well as the Legal Tender cases (110 U. S. 421, 4 S. Ct. 122, 28 L. Ed. 204), Farmers' & Mechanics' National Bank v. Dearing (91 U. S. 29, 23 L. Ed. 196), and McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. Ed. 579).

The act being constitutional, we are asked to hold that the bank may not sell its own securities and fix the rates at which it will discount or rediscount paper, when it is given the power by the specific terms of the Federal Reserve Act to do all of these things.

The grant of power over open-market operations contained in the new bill is not a new or different delegation from that contained in the present Federal Reserve Act, which has been held valid on numerous occasions. The new bill is even more clearly constitutional than the existing law, since the bill contains a statement of policy more definite and comprehensive than the statements upheld in many cases by the Supreme Court.

The language of the law upon which the appellate court predicated this decision in the New York case was "accommodation of commerce and business." Is there any man who will say that this language is any more specific for the guidance of the Federal Reserve Board than to require the Federal Reserve Board to ascertain whether or not policies in operation are conducive to business stability and to mitigate unstabilizing fluctuations in the general level of production, trade prices, and employment?

I believe that a fair legal interpretation of the language of the bill before the House is that it gives a broader definition of policies than that contained in the law upon which the decision of the court in the New York case was based.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency will admit, however, that without the Goldsborough amendment there is serious question as to the constitutionality of this particular provision, but that if the Goldsborough amendment is adopted it will at least tend to make more certain the constitutionality of the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not claim a place among the able lawyers of the House, but if the gentleman wishes my opinion, I would say that I have not the slightest doubt of the constitutionality of this act as written or as it would be written if the Goldsborough amendment should be adopted.

I do not desire to address myself further to the question of the constitutionality of this act.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. I was not quite sure, although I listened carefully to the gentleman's citation of this case, if the gentleman seriously contends that the case cited is in point, as against the argument made by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. STEAGALL. Absolutely. It sustained the constitutionality and the validity of the powers conferred in the present Federal Reserve law which are less specific and less comprehensive than the language employed in the pending bill which I have just read.

Mr. Chairman, no one questions the fact that wide fluctuations in prices are calamitous and that all efforts directed toward keeping price fluctuations within reasonable limits should be made. But changes in prices are only part of the picture. The maintenance of the national income and of full employment is more important to the national welfare than is the maintenance of a specified average of prices of a selected group of commodities in wholesale or retail markets. When unemployment prevails there is a lack of buying power and, in the absence of an adequate demand for goods, a decline in prices inevitably follows. Maintenance of employment in turn depends on the maintenance of a reasonably constant level of production. In setting up a standard to guide the Federal Reserve Board in the determination of monetary policy, therefore, it has been proposed not to confine the instructions to the maintenance of prices but to make them broad enough to cover all the important elements in economic life, including in addition to prices the volume of production and of employment, which are the factors on which the national income ultimately depends.

Experience has demonstrated that prices alone are not a satisfactory basis for Federal Reserve policy. There have been periods since the war when prices on the average were stable while the volume of production went up or down by as much as 20 percent. The entire orgy of speculation in 1928 and 1929 occurred with a relatively stable level of commodity prices. In fact, it was the stability of commodity prices that prevented a prompt realization of the fact that a dangerous situation was rapidly developing in the security and real-estate markets.

Price changes, furthermore, are likely to reflect conditions that had developed in earlier phases of an economic cycle. By the time that prices begin to move, either up or down, the forces that have caused them to rise or fall may have spent themselves, and monetary policy, in the interest of economic stability and even of price stability, should be reversed, so that the price index is not a satisfactory guide to monetary policy even for the maintenance of price stability itself.

Proposals for price stability as a guide to monetary policy necessarily refer to some index or average of prices, because stability of prices of individual commodities is neither feasible nor desirable. Changes in prices are in fact the mechanism through which economic stability tends to be maintained. This is often misunderstood. Those interested in price stability are thinking for the most part in terms of the prices of their products. For example, the cotton grower is interested primarily in the prices of the cotton which he has to sell and the prices of the goods that he has to buy. A stable general level of prices would not satisfy the cotton grower if it represented, for example, the net effect of a fall in the price of cotton, which is what he has to sell, offset by a rise in the price of food which he has to buy. Nevertheless, under the proposed mandate the Federal Reserve Board would be under obligation to use its influence toward this method of achieving stability. Let us take a concrete example. In 1926 when there was a sharp drop in cotton prices owing to a bumper crop, it would have been the duty of the Board under this proposal to use its influence in attempting to raise the prices of other commodities so as to maintain the stability of the general level of prices. The Board would receive little thanks for that from the cotton growers or from the country as a whole, and its efforts would not be used in the public interest.

For another example, at a time like 1927 when oil prices were declining as the result of new fields being discovered and improved methods of production introduced, it would have been a poor consolation to the producers of oil with falling prices that prices of other commodities, some of which they had to buy, were advancing because of a faithful performance of its mandatory duties by the Federal Reserve Board.

On the other hand, when the price of wheat in 1924 advanced on account of a world shortage, which the Federal Reserve Board could not control or counteract, it might have been satisfactory to the wheat growers if price stability were maintained through a decline in such commodities as they must buy, such as shoes, for example. But would there be justice to the producer of shoes in a sacrifice of the price of his product to the principle of stability, when this stability had been disturbed by a rise in the price of the food that he must buy?

What producers are concerned with, furthermore, is not the price of their product alone, but the net return on the sale of their products, which is the result of the volume produced, times the price, less the volume of materials and other elements of cost, times their prices. In manufacturing industries production is under control, but the volume of sales depends on the market, and prices are often reduced in order to increase sales, and to achieve a maximum return. When profits decline, manufacturers curtail output, and their losses may be diminished by reducing the volume of operation. In agriculture, however, production is less easily influenced because it depends in larger part on natural forces, and changes in buying power of the public are reflected chiefly in price fluctuations. Farmers, therefore, have a direct interest in sustained industrial employment and national income, which are essential for the marketing of crops at profitable prices.

A good illustration of different circumstances that may be reflected in the course of the price level occurred in recent months. Since the early part of last November, the general wholesale price index has gone up from 76 percent of the 1926 average to 80 percent. This has represented the net result of an advance of 17 percent in the price of farm products and of 13 percent in the price of foods, while other commodities during all this period showed little change. This recent rise, furthermore, has not been general for farm products and foods. It has been largely in livestock and meats. The rise in prices of these commodities has reflected the influence of complex factors, including the activities of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and last summer's drought. In such a case, should the Board be required to use its influence toward reduction of the prices of other products because the prices of livestock are advancing? And yet the maintenance of price stability would make this course of action compulsory.

Or, again, should prices of domestic articles be depressed because prices of imported goods advance? This would mean that the American people would have to be content with less for what they sell, because they would have the privilege of paying more for what they buy; certainly a doubtful source of satisfaction.

A similar question arises when a technological improvement results in the lowering of prices for commodities, like automobiles or electric refrigerators, for example. Would it be desirable to offset this by raising other prices in order to maintain the sacredness of stability in the general price average? Would it not be better for the country as a whole to take advantage of lower prices to increase consumption, production, and employment, without disturbing other prices?

If the Board were required to work out policies on the basis of a price average alone, without reference to other conditions, the selection of a suitable price index would be a difficult problem. It would occasion debate and would result in dissatisfaction on the part of various groups that would think that some other index than the one selected might have indicated the desirability of a policy more favorable to the particular group. The decision in the end would have to be arbitrary, and yet this decision would make a great deal of difference. Between the middle of 1925 and the middle of 1927, for example, the cost of living index for this country showed little change, while wholesale prices declined by 9 percent. In a period like that, which should the Board try to stabilize? In Sweden an attempt was made to stabilize the cost of living, and, in order to do that, policies were pursued which resulted in an advance of wholesale prices, particularly for imported commodities. In February 1935 the cost-of-living index in Sweden was the same as in September 1931, while the index of wholesale prices was up 6 percent and prices of imported commodities were up 19 percent.

In the final analysis, the object of enforcing price stability is the effect that such stability would have in moderating fluctuations in business and in assuring justice between creditors and debtors. Price stability, therefore, is not so much an end in itself as a means to an end. What is proposed in the pending bill is to direct the Federal Reserve Board to use such powers as it has in attempting to bring about the desired end itself, namely, a more stable level of production and employment, as well as prices. It is believed that this objective is better, not only because it is more general and, therefore, is not beset by the numerous technical difficulties that have just been described, but also because it is more direct and aims at what must be the ultimate objective of monetary policy, namely, a condition of sustained prosperity for the people of the entire country. Of course, this is the desire of the author of the pending amendment; a desire cherished by all of us.

I wish to pay tribute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

He and I have labored for many years as Members of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. No one here has a deeper appreciation of the gentleman's splendid ability, the high quality of his patriotism, his devotion to his convictions or a more affectionate regard than I have for my beloved friend, the gentleman from Maryland. Anything I may say about this legislation relates to the legislation itself and involves no criticism of my warm friend, the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. Chairman, this question has been before the Banking and Currency Committee for many years. We have had before us many of those who are regarded as the best experts in the country. We had the Strong bill, an entirely different measure than that proposed here today, but we were told in 1927 that the Strong measure would work the same magical achievements that have been outlined so eloquently before you this afternoon.

Later we had another bill known as the "Goldsborough bill", which was considered by our committee for quite a time and on which hearings were held. That was still another measure different from the proposal now presented but likewise put forth as a sane remedy for our economic ills.

In 1932 this House passed what was known as the "Goldsborough bill" by a large vote. I want to say that the Members need not imagine that they are voting for this same bill when they support the amendment now proposed to the pending bill. Just here let me say that when that measure was before us gold was selling at $20 an ounce. It is now selling at $35 an ounce. The bill in 1932 provided that it should be the duty of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks to use their power to reestablish the price level of the period from 1921 to 1929 as disclosed by the index of commodity wholesale markets of the Department of Labor and to stabilize prices upon that basis. That is not the proposal before us this afternoon as embodied in this amendment.

We were told by the experts in 1932 that the provisions of the Goldsborough bill and the stabilization of prices at the 1926 level was the answer to our problem. A little later the same experts came before us and told us that the remedy was to be found in the devaluation of the dollar by reduction of the gold content. Later on the same experts told us that the commodity index sought to be established in the bill of 1932 sponsored by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] was not the answer to the problem but we must resort to a basic commodity index in order to accomplish the desired results and to secure the relief so much desired.

After that we had a bill making provision for a monetary authority. The authority was to be a sort of supreme court of finance. The members were to hold office for life and draw salaries, like the members of the Supreme Court of the United States, and we were to entrust power to them to do the job by means of the manipulation of gold.

A few days ago in connection with the consideration of this bill one of the experts, for whom I have the kindest regard and respect, and who appeared before us year after year during the time this question has been before us, told us that he had just recently found the answer. This gentleman had depicted from time to time the glowing results and lasting relief that would come to the people of the United States by the adoption of each of the various proposals. The same economist came before us the other day and said that he had recently found the real answer, which he said was 100 percent reserves to be maintained by the banks.

Mr. Chairman, that is the teaching that our committee has had during these recent years. I mention this to show that even those who are supposed to know so much change their position from year to year and do not come before our committee a second time with the same program.

Mr. Chairman, I read from the pending amendment. This is what the gentleman offered in the House in 1932:

It is declared to be the policy of the United States that the average purchasing power of the dollar as ascertained by the Department of Labor in the wholesale commodity markets for the period covering the years 1921 to 1929, inclusive, shall be promptly restored; and that after such restoration shall have been achieved, the purchasing power of the dollar shall be maintained—

And so forth.

That in substance is what was in the Goldsborough bill of 1932. But now our experts tell us that is not sufficient, that it is not the answer; that the wholesale commodity market index is a rigid, inflexible standard which is unresponsive to the operations and policies undertaken by the Federal Reserve Board. So that it will not do. The gentleman from Maryland adopts that view. So he does not stop with that provision. He adds this further paragraph:

That after such restoration shall have been achieved, the purchasing power of the dollar shall be maintained substantially stable in relation to a suitable index of basic commodity prices which the Federal Reserve Board shall cause to be compiled and published in complete detail at weekly intervals.

An analysis of the amendment must justify the statement that the power conferred under the second paragraph is inharmonious with the first paragraph and would confer upon the Federal Reserve Board the power to select an index of basic commodity prices and which would confer upon the Federal Reserve Board the power to change the effect of anything achieved under the first paragraph. It would confer an additional power not necessarily in harmony with that carried in the first paragraph. Under these provisions everything would depend upon the Board.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the second provision would give the Federal Reserve Board a new power, separate and distinct and out of harmony with the first, and susceptible of administration that would nullify the first provision. The amendment, however, does not stop there. It goes further and says:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to establish or cause to be established in the United States a free and open market in which gold and silver may be bought and sold for use, investment, or trade, and to determine, without limitation, and with the advice of the Federal Reserve Board, the amounts and the prices at which the Treasury shall buy and sell gold and silver.

The last provision has finally included silver along with gold in the powers of manipulation that are to be conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury. This power is now vested in the President. Of course, it is limited to a 50-percent devaluation of the gold dollar, but those powers are in the President.

If, as the gentleman stated here this afternoon, it could be demonstrated that by the manipulation of gold the Secretary of the Treasury could accomplish all the glowing achievements outlined by him, there is no necessity for the provisions of the first and second paragraphs because there is no question here about the powers that are conferred by the last paragraph of this bill. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to deal in gold and silver "without limitations", and in the exercise of these powers he could pay $1,000 an ounce for gold or silver if he saw fit to use the power conferred "without limitations" under the language of the amendment.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I want to suggest to the gentleman that the Secretary of the Treasury and the executive departments of the Government have elected to fix the price of gold and silver.

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; I stated that. But under the amendment the powers would be "without limitations."

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. And there is no free market for them now. This amendment would change that.

Mr. STEAGALL. I understand that.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I do not want to take the gentleman's time.

Mr. STEAGALL. I understand the authority would be free from any restriction. There would be no limitations to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to manipulate the value of gold and silver. I thought I had made that clear.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Only for the purpose, however, of raising the price and fixing it.

Mr. STEAGALL. Oh, yes; but what becomes of your government of law when you confer such powers upon the Secretary of the Treasury? I should think that any human being, however great, would dread the thought of such vast powers and responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, members of our committee have found that these men who know so much about this question do not agree among themselves. The fact is, not one of them agrees with himself very long!

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given 5 additional minutes and that the gentleman devote the time to answering questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. You may adopt this amendment, and when you have enacted it into law you will simply find that you have conferred upon the Federal Reserve Board and any incoming administration about the same powers that we are conferring under this bill. The situation is such that we are forced to trust these officials of the Government to deal intelligently and constructively with the powers entrusted to their hands.

Some of us do not believe that in the present confusion that exists here and throughout the world, the Federal Reserve Board and this administration should be put in a strait-jacket with rigid, inflexible requirements that many of the brightest minds of the economic world advise us are impossible of fulfillment.

The present administration is dealing with these problems as best it can day by day. There is no lack of sympathy with the objectives desired by the gentleman from Maryland, in which I share and in which every Member of this House shares, and which the administration has disclosed is dear to the hearts of those who are responsible for the administration of the Government at this time.

The President is attempting to meet these difficulties step by step. He has done it in a broad, sympathetic, constructive way, and we are making progress. He has before him at all times full and complete information of world conditions, as well as developments in the United States, and in view of the sympathy he has shown and the great progressive steps he has taken in solving these problems, he should not be restricted and hampered in future efforts in meeting these tremendous responsibilities as they arise from day to day, until we can find our way out of the darkness and into the light. [Applause.]

Mr. HOEPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOEPEL. The gentleman made certain references to certain experts, whom he criticized—

Mr. STEAGALL. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not mean to criticize anybody.

Mr. HOEPEL. Will the gentleman kindly state to the Committee who the experts were that drafted this bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not think the gentleman expects me to stop now to go into a discussion of the preparation of this bill.

Mr. HOEPEL. Did the Secretary of the Treasury draft this bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. Everybody knows where this bill came from. This bill came from the administration intrusted by the American people to supply leadership for the battle with the difficulties that confront this Nation, and they expect you and me to support that administration. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Now, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The gentleman has made a very broad statement and I must call his attention to the fact that the members of the steering committee of the House that met day before yesterday were unable to agree with what the gentleman now says, that there is any mandate from the administration to support this bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. I have not mentioned the steering committee nor what the steering committee did.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. No; but the steering committee is supposed to speak for the administration.

Mr. STEAGALL. I said this bill represented the efforts of the administration chosen by the American people to supply leadership to guide us out of the difficulties of this hour, and I repeat that statement. The statement was made over the radio by the President himself and was published in the press of the United States, which justifies the representation that the administration is back of this measure.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Were we not elected by the people?

Mr. STEAGALL. Oh, yes; and I hope you will be elected again. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, for a year and a half we have been giving a great deal of study to the commodity dollar. I assume that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] is in keeping with the bill which has been introduced for the stabilization of the price commodity index.

I have been a member of a subcommittee with the gentleman from Maryland, and I might say that I was very sympathetic with the program which he presented. I was sympathetic with the bill introduced by the gentleman last year, by which a monetary authority was to be set up whereby the prices of commodities might be regulated through manipulation of the currency, and while this amendment has been before the public during the last 2 weeks we have been flooded with requests from agricultural associations for the enactment of this amendment.

Now, I represent an agricultural district, and I have analyzed this from the standpoint of the farmer. I think if I had found anything in the amendment which would bring them some relief, anything which would remove the disparity between the things they sell and the things which they buy, I might consider it favorably. But I want to refer particularly to the fact that in the bill introduced a year ago there was established for the purpose of stabilizing commodity prices an independent agency of the Government.

But there was no politics in that agency, because it was provided in the bill that if the price of commodities rose 10 percent or went below 10 percent of an established index line the Board would automatically go out of existence. That is how far that went in establishing an independent board.

Personally, Mr. Chairman, I cannot see anything in the amendment which will remove the disparity between the price of what the farmer pays and what the farmer buys. The farmers are hoping against hope, thinking that this bill would do what the proposed monetary authority might do. There is no connection between the Federal monetary authority bill and this amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is an entirely new theory as far as the Federal Reserve System is concerned. It is a new set-up. Subsection (o) on page 51 establishes a new policy, wherein the Federal Reserve Board is charged with the responsibility of stabilizing prices. This in distinction of the present purpose of the System, which is to effectuate financial stability. This is the first attempt to bring the two together in close affiliation—price stability and financial stability.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. In a moment. By financial stability I mean what the Republican Party platform said that party stood for, and what the Democratic platform said that party adhered to, namely, a sound currency. You cannot put the power to stabilize business into a political board with any degree of confidence. I was interested in what our chairman said about these economists who appeared before the committee; and let me augment what he said by the statement that of the 15 or 20 economists who appeared before the subcommittee and who have appeared before our committee in the last year and a half, they were in accord on only one question, and that was that the quantity of money which is outstanding has very little relationship to the commodity price index. They did agree, however, that velocity of credit controls the price of commodities; and we cannot have velocity of credit, my friends, until we have confidence, and we cannot have confidence in this country until we stop tinkering with the currency. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this is the first attempt to inject this idea into the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the original bill contained this very thing and was rejected by this House. That is the fact.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am not attempting to cover the history of the Federal Reserve System. I was talking of the law as it now exists, and the change from the law enacted in 1913 that this bill proposes.

Mr. KELLER. But this idea was in the original bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, what we want to accomplish, if anything at all, is stability not only of our domestic currency but also of international exchange, so that we can sell the products of our farms and factories in foreign countries. As far as I know there is no country other than the United States that has anything approaching a bimetallic reserve behind its currency. There is no country with the exception of possibly one that has adopted the commodity-dollar theory, and that country has relatively a small number of commodities, and so we stand alone among the nations of the world on something that somewhat resembles a bimetallic base, and our situation would not be improved were we to adopt this theory of a commodity dollar. With the possible exception of one country there is no other country in the world that has that standard. How can we deal with foreign countries, how can we sell our farm produce and the products of our manufacturing establishments unless there is some community between the pound, the franc, the dollar, and all these other kinds of money? So, eventually, the large nations of the world will have to get together on a common base. Whether that base is gold, whether it be silver, or be a bimetallic base or a symmetrical base, does not matter so much, as long as there is a common understanding among the nations of the world that that is a common base on which we can exchange our goods and credits. So we are getting farther away from international stability by adopting this amendment which sets up the commodity dollar, just as we have gotten farther away from international stability by tinkering around with silver. I am not afraid of silver, but it is just as logical for me, coming from Michigan, to insist that you monetize copper on a 50-to-1 basis as it is for you gentlemen who represent silver-producing States to insist that silver be re-monetized, based on a 16-to-1 ratio. I am not particularly anxious about that base, so long as it is a base on which we can stabilize our domestic trade and in our dealing with other nations stabilize our exchange. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am sorry I cannot yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, if you will adopt the Goldsborough amendment you will put the scales of justice into this bill. You will substitute for a dishonest dollar an honest dollar, and you will remove the conditions that have existed in the past whereby this country was plunged into wild inflation and in its aftermath wreck and ruin. I am surprised at the chairman's speech. This is a sovereign body of men sitting here representing 126,000,000 people. Every man should use his own brain. Of course, we go along with the administration, but surely we are not expected to accept every bill that comes from every bureau as perfect, to which we cannot offer an amendment. The provision in the bill that the Goldsborough amendment takes the place of is a milk-and-cider proposition. The Goldsborough amendment is specific and direct. Surely the chairman remembers, if he remembers the testimony of all of those who have come before the Banking and Currency Committees of the House and the Senate for 4 or 5 or 6 years, who testified they were constantly confused, they knew not what policy to pursue, they had no goal, and the amendment of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH gives them the goal.

The rest of the bill gives them the machinery. It gives them the rediscount rates, the power of raising and lowering the reserves of the banks, and the open-market transactions. That gives them the machinery, but with that machinery they have no goal at which to aim. Every member of the board differing among themselves as to what is stable business, as to what is the stable financial situation, as to where they ought to go, or what they ought to do. There are just as many needles pointing to different goals as there are men on the board. Every needle points in a different direction for the North Pole.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Would not the adoption of the Goldsborough amendment seek to correct the criticism as to the constitutionality of the bill, by prescribing a definite mode by which those values should be placed?

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Unquestionably. You heard a decision read by an inferior court. That is one of the strong evidences that it would be unconstitutional, because if the Supreme Court guesses right, the inferior court 9 times out of 10 guesses wrong. But this gives the board a clear, definite goal to work to. It gives them the levers they need. It takes away doubt and confusion, so that they will have somewhere to drive to. If you leave this bill as it is, suppose they take a notion that present conditions are all right; suppose they take a notion that there should be twice as much inflation as there was in 1928; suppose they take a notion that we ought to have more contraction, but they cannot get together. Influences come to bear on them. But here the Congress tells them what they shall do. That is our duty.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman think it is prudent or wise to vest powers in the Federal Reserve Board without directing them how they shall be used?

Mr. CROSS of Texas. I do not think so. I think this Congress should give them a goal to go to. Then we would be performing our duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to cut off debate, but I want to inquire if we may not agree upon the time which shall be used in the further discussion of this amendment?

Mr. PIERCE. Well, I would like a minute on this bill. I have not taken much time. I think it is improper to try to cut off debate on so important a measure as this.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have asked for 5 minutes on this question.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, may we agree upon 40 minutes? I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this amendment close in 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that further debate on this amendment be concluded in 40 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD and Mr. GRAY of Indiana rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] opposed to the amendment?

Mr. GIFFORD. I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he should recognize some Member in favor of the amendment at this time. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, it has been well and truly said that all great problems by power analysis can be resolved into a few propositions capable of simple presentation and understanding by the people. I believe that this is true of our currency problems, of our economic and industrial problems, of the problems of this panic and depression, of the solution of the cause, looking to a rational remedy and a restoration of normal conditions.

The problem is a problem of prices, a problem of low values and prices, a problem of high values and prices, a problem of falling values and prices, a problem of rising values and prices, a problem of the control of values and prices.

The new Congress convened in 1933, on full and proper inquiry, found that the depression was caused by a failure of the buying and consuming power, the inability of the people to buy and consume the products of farm, factory, and workshop. And Congress further found that this failure had resulted from a fall of values and prices which had deprived the people of their earnings and income, and surplus over taxes, debts, and fixed charges, which surplus is their power to buy and consume. And Congress further found that a recovery of normal prosperity required a rise of values and prices, for a return of earnings and income and a restoration of the buying and consuming power.

The solution reached by Congress on the facts found and considered that it was the fall of values and prices which destroyed the buying and consuming power and brought on the panic or depression, has not only been generally accepted as true, but it has been proved and conclusively shown that the congressional diagnosis was right, the precise and exact economic operations whereby and under which the fall of prices destroyed the buying and consuming power can be followed, traced, shown, and demonstrated to a conclusive mathematical certainty.

When this crisis fell upon the farming industry, with the higher normal values and prices, the farmers were selling not more than one-third of their crops with which to pay taxes, interest, and fixed charges, and were left with the other two-thirds or more, with which to buy, take, and consume the products of mill, factory, and workshop. But when the sudden fall of prices and values came the farmers, instead of being required to sell only one-third or less of their crops and produce to pay taxes, interest, and debt installments, were forced and compelled to sell three-thirds or all of their crops and produce with which to pay taxes, interest, and fixed charges, and were left with no part or surplus over, of their crops and produce to sell, with which to buy, take, and consume the products of factory, mill, and workshop. And the buying and consuming power of 40,000,000 farm population and dependents were destroyed and taken from them.

And finally this failure and destruction of the farmers' buying and consuming power left the retail merchants without demand, left the wholesale house without sales, left the factory, mill, and workshop without orders. And the wheels of industry slackened and slowed down and brought unemployment to industrial labor, and destroyed the buying and consuming power of another 30,000,000 and their dependents, and the fatal circle of hard times was realized and complete.

And likewise the same economic operations carried backward and in reverse order for a rise of values and the price level, will restore a surplus of earnings and income over debts, interest, taxes, and fixed charges, the buying and consuming power of the people, is now no less conceded as proved and demonstrated.

Pursuant to the cause so found and requirements and remedies so determined, Congress provided two different relief policies whereby to raise and restore values and prices and bring back a return of earnings and income first, and primarily a restoration of farm buying and consuming power. One policy providing for the restoration of values and prices was the farm-crop reduction and destruction plan which provided for the reduction and destruction of farm food, clothing-material crops, and stock, and a processing tax levied upon the people of the towns and cities whereby to raise prices and increase farm income.

It was further found by Congress that the fall of values and prices had come coincident or following a contraction and withdrawal of money and that a restoration of values and prices required a return of money back in circulation. And as another and further remedy provided, and upon the facts found and pursuant to these conclusions reached, Congress authorized and ordered printed $2,000,000,000 of new money to be used to replenish the money supply.

And, in obedience to the authorization and order, the printing of the new money was begun, and the great newspapers of the country, announcing and heralding the beginning, published photos and picture illustrations showing the Treasury force and officials carrying great armfuls of the new money or currency preparatory to its use to restore the money supply in circulation.

Following this congressional authorization and order, Congress enacted the currency provisions of the Farm Relief Act of May 12, 1933, providing four different forms of currency to be resorted to in the alternate or all used together concurrently as may be found required for the purpose. These currency provisions provided for the remonetization of silver, for the revaluation of gold, for a resort to Federal Reserve notes, and for the issue of United States currency notes, but all was left permissive and optional for administration and enforcement.

Immediately with the enactment of the crop-reduction and destruction measure, the act was entered upon with an army of employees for administration at the cost of millions. In good faith and obedience to law, millions of acres of fertile farm land were withdrawn or taken from cultivation and left to grow in weeds and waste. Millions of acres of farm food crops and farm clothing-material crops were plowed up or otherwise destroyed while the people in the towns and cities were hungry and suffering for food, and were shivering in the cold for want of clothing to protect their bodies.

But the reduction and destruction of farm food supplies and clothing materials were not confined to farm crops but the administration has been carried to farm food stock as well. Two millions of young, immature hogs have been ordered killed and withdrawn from the farm food supplies, and the dead bodies of slaughtered pigs, if lain in a row one after the other, would form a line hundreds of miles long, of decaying, decomposed meat food.

But more than the destruction of millions of young, immature hogs and the wholesale food supply destroyed, over one-half million of mother swine have been cut open and disembowled and millions of posthumous pigs torn from the entrails and thrown out, to rot and decay with the butcherered mothers, and the barnyards and brood lots made a veritable Golgotha of bone and decaying flesh, all to prevent an adequate food supply and to make sure of a scarcity and raise prices arbitrarily.

Every farmer has been commandeered as an executioner for the reduction of a declared surplus supply of farm food and dairy stock, and every farm made a slaughter pen and marked in crimson gore and left wreaking in the stench of the decaying animal carcasses.

A surplus of dairy stock was declared and thousands of young heifers and milk cows have been ordered left unbred and shipped to market for slaughter and sacrificed for common beef to reduce the milk supply available to the towns and great cities, all to limit the supply of milk and milk products and to raise the price of milk products, dwarfing and stunting ill-fed children and jeopardizing the life of new-born babies dependent upon dairy food to live and compelling distracted parents to pay more for less without more to pay with.

And further and in pursuance of the crop reduction and destruction plan, while the people of the towns and cities are compelled to pay for less without greater earnings to pay with, a processing tax is levied upon them to make up to the farmers for their loss by destruction.

And while the country is waiting in suspense for the realization of restored prices of crops by reduction and destruction, billions are being borrowed at interest and charged against posterity and the future, for the relief of the millions waiting unemployed and on relief. And this course and policy is continued until the present is burdened with crushing tax assessments and the future generations to come are to be born with a millstone of debt dangling and weighing upon their necks and hobbled by a debt chain and ball fastened and riveted to their childhood ankles.

And now at the end of the weary, bloody trail of the farm-relief administration, the reduction of food, and the destruction of clothing material, the cruel slaughter of mother swine, more remain idle and unemployed and the army is still recruiting. And with the processing taxes levied upon the diminishing, vanishing food supply to raise and lift farm prices and compel the people to pay more for less, and borrowing billions at interest and piling high the debt burden to provide relief during the strain of the remedy, more millions remain on the relief rolls.

Certainly it will not or cannot be said that the farm-relief measures have not been fully and adequately administered, that the remedy has not been tried out, that the people had not borne the sacrifice, that human patience has not been exhausted sufficiently for trial as a temporary expedient or to demonstrate a permanent relief program. Certainly the administration of the farm crop-relief measures has been pursued and carried to complete exhaustion of the remedy and to the limits for men to bear, and nothing has been left undone to measure the merits of the farm-relief program under the crop reduction and destruction plan.

But while the farm-reduction plan was entered upon promptly and vigorously, the currency relief measures were left without administration or enforcement. The two billions of new money ordered prepared disappeared from existence as if by magic and without going into circulation as intended. There has been no remonetization of silver. There has been no resort to Federal Reserve notes. There has been no issue of United States currency notes. There has been no revaluation of gold to effect the purpose for which intended as provided by the Currency Relief Act.

The phrase "the devaluation of gold" means the same as a rise of prices and values measured in the relative value of money. The dollar has been devalued externally abroad but not devalued internally here. The dollar now calls for 59 cents abroad, but here was where the law was to operate, here where the benefits were intended, here the people of this country in order to pay their taxes, interest, and debts must still give up a dollar and twenty-four cents' worth of labor products and property to obtain the dollar with which to pay.

With an understanding of the operations of money, that the enforcement of the currency measures restoring back into circulation the money secretly withdrawn from circulation would cause the stolen value to leave money and return again to property, commodities, and labor, it is plain to be realized why the crop reduction and destruction plan was urged, prosecuted, and advanced even at the awful economic sacrifice and loss and the costs mounting in the billions, the currency measures were left suspended with only a mere pretense of administration.

It is plain to be realized why the two billions of new money ordered prepared for immediate use, and first heralded far and wide in newspaper photo illustrations, to replenish the volume of money, has never been used or paid out but concealed or secretly destroyed. It is plain to be realized why the currency provisions of the Farm Relief Act enacted by Congress May 12, 1933, providing four different forms of currency wherewith to replenish the money supply, were left held permissive and optional and have never been resorted to nor administered for the purpose intended.

It is plain to be realized why the manipulating bankers and financiers who had made billions from the depression by the manipulation of money and credit through the transfer of commodities and labor values to their money bonds and war debt claims, claimed the right to be left in control of money. And why they have exerted their great powers to advance other relief measures, crop reduction, borrowing and spending, while holding the currency measures from administration and enforcement to prevent a return of money and credit, thereby to save their ill-gotten gains.

The Goldsborough amendment, here offered to the pending banking bill, is to make these currency measures mandatory, to compel their administration and enforcement, to require the money secretly withdrawn from circulation to be returned back for use in circulation for a restoration of normal values, prices, and wages.

If this amendment is adopted, the 1926 price level will be restored, $50,000,000,000 in values will be restored to farm property alone, and seventy-five millions in values to other property. It will restore ten billions farm earnings and incomes, as buying and consuming power of the farm population, which will give employment to 8,000,000 workers, two and one-half times the Works Relief appropriations. It will start the factory wheels turning. It will disband the army of unemployed. It will take the suffering, starving, shivering people from the relief rolls of the country. It will treble farm incomes without the reduction of crops, without the destruction of crops, without the slaughter of immature hogs, without the disemboweling of mother swine, without the slaughter of dairy herds, without the scarcity of the food and clothing supply.

It will lift the cruel blight from nature's copious bounty. It will restore normal prosperity alike to farm and industrial workers and will leave the people again to revel and exult in the pride and pleasure of living independent from their own labor and rejoicing bringing in the sheaves. It will restore the tax-paying power, the interest, and the debt-paying power, whereby to save and salvage the homes and farms of the people remaining in the shadows of foreclosures, and fathers, mothers, and children from the stigma of insolvency and bankruptcy.

It is not only the parity of farm prices with the prices the farmers have to pay that is necessary for farm relief. It is the far greater disparity of the prices at which the farmer must sell with the taxes and debts he must pay. Taxes assessed and payable today were fixed on a higher level of prices, on the basis of higher farm earnings and income, and the interest, debts, and money contracts today are largely renewal-debt obligations entered on the basis of higher prices and under earnings and income—higher.

The fall of values, prices, and wages while interest, taxes, and debts remained unchanged, has left the farmers suffering a crushing disparity by increasing and multiplying taxes and debts measured in labor and the products of labor in which they are and can only be paid. This is the parity of prices, the parity with taxes, interest, and debts, which must be restored to the farmer as well as to all the debtor class before the people can pay their debts, before they can salvage their farms and homes and safeguard themselves from bankruptcy, and make a surplus over from which to live.

In order for the farmers to prosper to meet and pay their mortgages and debts and save their farms from foreclosure, they must not only have a parity of prices with the prices they are compelled to pay, but they must have their price level restored for their full and normal production. There is only one way to accomplish this and that is to restore the money supply which was secretly withdrawn from circulation and reverse the money operations which forced down values and prices until values and prices are raised again, and the debt-paying power is restored with a surplus for buying and consuming power. Debts were not only contracted under higher price levels, but under earnings from a full crop reduction. And they can neither be paid under a lower price level nor under a higher price level from a part crop but only under higher prices from a full crop.

No one is proposing or demanding the repeal or suspension of the crop-reduction plan in advance of the administration and enforcement of the currency relief measure to restore farm values and prices. But many serious-thinking people, including farmers, are imperatively demanding and insisting that the currency relief measure be enforced at the earliest possible date so the reduction and destructiveness of farm food crops and stock can be suspended and relief and normal conditions can be restored with plenty, and abundance made available to all.

While assuming to restore farm parity prices under crop reduction and processing taxes with prices farmers must pay for farm equipment and supplies, at the same time under the N. R. A. codes, the antitrust laws are suspended and manufacturers of supplies were and are left free to raise prices to farmers still higher. And prices to farmers have been raised still higher for lumber and all building materials and all farm equipment and supplies and making the disparity in farm prices, with the price they must pay still greater.

It is no longer a question of which policy shall be followed for permanent, rational relief, the crop reduction plan, or the currency relief measures, to raise values, prices, and wages, and restore the buying and consuming power. The one and only question remaining between these two relief policies is, How long shall the crop-reduction plan with its wholesale reduction and destruction of farm food and clothing material, with its counterpart of borrowing and spending, be continued, for temporary relief upon the country? Or, in other words, how long shall the currency relief measures for the restoration of money back in circulation be deferred and further postponed, or how long can the policy be postponed while debts are increasing and multiplying, with crop reduction and destruction decreasing their power and ability to pay?

But regardless of the merits of the farm reduction and destruction program as a temporary relief measure, the whole program must sooner or later be abandoned as a menacing danger to human welfare and is so declared by those administering the act. Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace, must be accepted as authorized to speak and declaring the policy of the farm reduction plan at Angola, Ind., August 9, 1934, the Secretary after urging farm reduction as necessary for the immediate present and to be adhered to for the time being, said:

It is true that the farm reduction program cannot go (be carried) on forever. That would be disastrous, but it is the best to follow at present.

This means, and is a realization, that all wealth and human sustenance must come from the ground, all from the bosom of mother earth; and that men can only prosper, can only live better and in greater enjoyment of life accordingly as they labor and prod the earth to provide more and better of its fruits for their better enjoyment and well-being.

And the people laboring under debts, as well as all people who would live better, can only pay and discharge their debts and obligations, can only live better and in greater enjoyment by prodding the earth to produce more and better of its fruits; and that a failure to produce or a reduction of the fruits of the earth, or a destruction of the fruits of the earth, is a cruel, fatal, failing policy, or in the language of the Secretary of Agriculture, "that would be disastrous." And further in the language of the Secretary, "That cannot go on forever", meaning that the crop-reduction plan is a mere temporary expedient to be resorted to for the time and only until a permanent, a rational remedy can be provided and carried into force and operation.

But the farm reduction or destruction program has not, will not, and cannot bring full, adequate relief to the farmer, even temporary for the time being. This not only appears on principle and theory, but is demonstrated by actual experience. The one and only purpose of restoring prices is to restore the farm earnings and income, is to give the farmers more money from their farms, is to give them a greater surplus over, after the payment of taxes, debts, and fixed charges, for their use as buying and consuming power. There are only these two plans or ways proposed to raise values and the price level. One way is by crop reduction or destruction, by creating a scarcity of want and/or supply. The other plan is by a restoration of money and credit back in circulation.

It is only the processing tax levied and collected from the consumers of farm foods and materials and paid to the farmers as a bonus which is increasing or can increase his earnings and give him more money from his farm, to provide him with a surplus over after the payment of taxes, debts, and fixed charges. But the processing taxes provided for in the farm-relief program were never intended or proposed or urged as a permanent or continuing policy of taxation to provide the farmers a continuing bonus and was and is contemplated to be removed at the earliest possible date for the relief of farm-food consumers of the towns and cities and as soon as other relief is provided.

Sooner or later, in the immediate future, the farm reduction or destruction plan, if continued, will be left entirely to depend wholly upon the increased price from crop reduction and without the payment of the bonus to augment and increase the farmer's income and give the farmer more money from his farm.

While the crop reduction or destruction plan, after the processing taxes and the bonus are discontinued, as they are to be discontinued, will not give the farmer more money, will not restore the farm surplus over taxes, debts, and fixed charges, his means to live and provide for his family, it will work a great wrong and hardship upon the laboring and common classes who live in the towns and cities, whose wages and earnings are not yet restored and who will be compelled to pay more for less without more earnings to pay with, decreasing the demand for farm products by decreasing the power to buy and consume.

The currency relief measures under the general operation of money and credit will raise and restore all values and prices and will increase all earnings and income, the wages of industrial labor as well as farm prices and income.

And when the people in towns and cities shall be required to pay more for their farm food supplies, they will have more to pay with and instead of buying less, they can and will buy more, increasing the demand for farm-food products.

The crop reduction and destruction plan, creating a scarcity or want of supply, will give the farmers a higher price for a part crop or the same money for a reduced crop as for a full crop at a lower price, but will not give the farmer greater earnings or income nor bring him more money from his farm. Raising farm prices and decreasing production is like the jugglery of tax rates and valuations. Lowering the rate and raising the valuation or raising the rate and lowering the valuation will yield no less or greater taxes. And raising the price by reducing farm production will give the farmer no more money from his farm. There is only one way to restore higher values and prices for the full crop or normal farm production. The restoration of money back in circulation will give the farmer higher prices for his full crop or normal production and will give him more money from his farm.

The two relief measures enacted, one providing for crop reduction and destruction and the other for a rise of values and prices by a reversal of the secret currency operations, restoring the stolen money back in circulation, may be compared or contrasted with the two ways of fighting fire—one by blasting and destroying surrounding buildings to prevent a spread, and the other by throwing water and chemicals and quenching the fire and saving the surrounding houses. The first, by destroying the surrounding buildings, is often justified to meet the emergencies and as a temporary expedient resorted to, but only until the fire engines can be put in operation and the fire brought under control, when the destruction of the surrounding buildings should be halted and stopped and the fighting confined to water and chemicals.

And so it is with farm-relief measures, the crop reduction and destruction plan, and the restoration of currency back in circulation. The reduction and processing plan was justified as an emergency measure, as a temporary expedient for the time, and until other and rational remedies could be provided and applied. But the continuation of the crop-reduction plan, the destruction of the food and clothing materials, while the people are starving and freezing, and while holding back and postponing the administration of the currency measures, would be like a continuation of the blasting, destroying surrounding buildings after the fire engines had arrived and the water and chemicals were ready to be thrown upon the fire and all means were at hand for its control. It would be folly as unjustified and criminal as the fighters of the city continuing their wanton destruction of buildings and refusing to start the fire engines and the operations of the chemical tanks after their arrival ready for operation.

If the currency relief measures enacted early in the special session providing for a restoration of the money supply had been promptly and in good faith entered upon, administered, and enforced, the price level would have been restored and there would have been no necessity for crop reduction and destruction, no necessity for the killing of little pigs, no necessity for disemboweling mother swine, no necessity for the slaughter of dairy herds, while the people were suffering for food and clothing.

And if these currency relief measures were enforced and administered now as the Goldsborough amendment here offered to the pending Federal Reserve bank bill would mandate, this crime against God, humanity, and nature—this destruction of food and clothing materials, in the sight of the starving, cold, and shivering—could be re-called and stopped, and farm values and prices would be restored to a higher normal level and stabilized. And the farmers of the country could rejoice in a restored buying and consuming power and the people of the towns and cities could revel and exult in like buying power and in plenty and great abundance.

There is one and only one reason why the currency-relief measures have been delayed and are being postponed. And that one single reason is that if the money secretly withdrawn from circulation was now restored back in circulation and the general-commodity price level raised, the men who have made billions from the fall of commodity and labor values, the property of the common masses of the people, and the resulting increase and multiplication of money bonds and money contract values, still owned and held by the certain special few—these men who have made billions would lose a part of their ill-gotten gains. And the one and only reason why the manipulating bankers and financiers, who have made their billions from the panic, by the secret contraction and withdrawal of money, have urged and are still urging adherence to the crop-reduction plan, the collection of the farm food-processing tax and its payment as a bonus to the farmers, is because the amount of farm food required by these certain special few men and the increase in price to them is small, trivial, and insignificant as compared to the billions which a restoration of currency would take from their money and money contracts, and return it back to labor and labor products, from where it was secretly taken.

These money-mad manipulating bankers in their desperation to make and hold surplus wealth and swollen fortunes and save their jeopardized, ill-gotten gains, would dry up the fountain source of the farm-food supply required to sustain life and of clothing and housing material to protect and shelter the body. They would leave the people suffering, writhing, starving, freezing, gasping for economic breath, while money-mad misers hover and brood over their piles of brazen gold in greedy grasp of what they cannot use but for which the world is suffering in despair.

Thanks to the farm and labor leaders, to Edward A. O'Neal, president of the Farm Bureau; to E. H. Everson, president the Farmers' Union; to L. J. Tabor, president the Farmers Grange; to the money crusader, Rev. Charles E. Coughlin; to Frank A. Vanderlip, the philanthropic banker, who places men and human welfare above the dollar; and a host of other advanced economists and students of public currency.

These men have waged and are waging a campaign of currency education, and the black night of monetary serfdom is lifting. The light of a new economic day is breaking. The people are realizing the magnitude of the crimes and crushing burdens imposed and held upon them by the manipulating bankers and financiers under the secret, private control of money.

And let it be said to the everlasting credit and to the everlasting glory of the farmers, the independent tillers of the soil, who work in partnership with nature, that they are recognized as better informed and as possessing a better knowledge of money than any other one class of men.

It was the farmers in communion with God and nature, with their minds as open as the firmament, with their visions broad as the horizon, with courage, resolution, and will breathed from the forests and the plains, who first declared for liberty and independence and won the freedom we now enjoy.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in my few remarks, and the remarks probably will be few from the minority side, let me say that we appreciate the endeavor of the gentleman from Maryland to bring back the prices that existed during the reign of Calvin Coolidge, our Republican President. [Applause.] This in itself is pleasing to us, and we regard this quarrel, so to speak, as one amongst the members of the majority party themselves.

The Committee on Banking and Currency listened to this argument about the commodity dollar for many days. Those who appeared before us, rather than being bankers, were so-called "disciples" of the commodity dollar, to whom you and I have listened for years back, and have heard much, of course, in the cloak rooms amongst its vigorous exponents.

Under the cloak of constitutionality the advocates of the commodity dollar hope to win. "The language carried in the bill itself would not be constitutional", they say, "so let us make it say exactly what we want, that the very directness of the Goldsborough amendment shall make it constitutional." We on this side of the Chamber applaud you when you say: "Let us not continue to delegate such great authority further." But do not let those win who want to delegate by the interpretation of conciseness and exactness, the only method of determining how the commodity-price index shall be arrived at. I deny that this method of attaining price level is anything like they have in England. I prefer the language of the bill in preference to the Goldsborough amendment, as it contains the words "trade, prices, and employment." As I have often said before, enlarge the base from certain commodity prices only.

I do not know what those commodities may be. The gentleman from Maryland mentioned a few the other day. I do not know whether those would be selected. Do you? Does the amount of cotton and the amount of wheat have anything to do with it; or will it be based on averages of salt, pepper, vinegar, and a few other things?

The Goldsborough amendment delegates to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board power to provide a suitable price index. Is this sufficient directness to bring it under the cloak of constitutionality? Do we leave them the broad powers of determining whether rubber, wheat, or some few other commodities shall be the basis of the price index? Again, I ask if the word "suitable" is sufficiently exact to make it constitutional. We doubt it.

I say again to the majority: It is your own fight; we congratulate you on trying to get back to normalcy; but as I often say: Do not pick out only a few commodities; watch your own dollar and see where your own dollar goes and let them not base that dollar on the spending of 20 percent of it; use the words in the English law, "Trade, employment"—many pay much money for wages. Do not base the value of the dollar on those few commodities, and the ones to be selected not known to us.

So, again congratulating you that you are trying to get back to the Republican days of prosperity, let me say that in my opinion the method you suggest is about as unconstitutional as the other. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PIERCE and Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he should recognize someone in favor of the amendment. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] for 5 minutes.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I think it was Will Rogers who first said there are two kinds of crazy people: Those in the asylums and those who think they know all about money. I do not believe I belong to the first class, nor do I claim to know all there is to be known about money; but I have made a study of the subject, and I want to add what weight I have to this discussion.

I am going to vote for the Goldsborough amendment. I believe it is a move in the right direction. There is no question that the world is up against managed currencies. Any student or any reader today must recognize this fact. The question is, Who is going to manage the currency? Is it going to be the Government—our friends on the other side of the aisle say, "It cannot be that, because that is political"—or shall it be the private bankers? I take it we are far safer with the currency being managed by the Government, to which the people have intrusted power over money, than we are to have it in the hands of the bankers. [Applause.] We had an example of what the bankers did with it in the crash of 1929. They certainly handled it, and handled it with a vengeance; and they handled the Reserve banks and the Reserve Board all in their own interest, and they nearly wrecked the country. Let us correct the situation at this time, when we have the chance, by strengthening the Reserve Board. There is a man at the head of the Reserve Board, a product of the Pacific Northwest, who in the years to come, many believe, will be recognized as one of the brilliant financial geniuses of the country. This bill, I understand, is largely his work.

The chairman of the committee upbraids us a bit for not following in the footsteps of the administration, claiming this is distinctly an administration bill. I yield to no one on this floor in my admiration of the man in the White House, but I do not believe he wants 435 mannequins here doing just what some bureau head tells us to do. I think each of us should exercise his own judgment and express his real opinion. I do not always agree with the administration. I think we should balance our Budget right now, and I am willing to step outside of my party and vote for tax laws that will come somewhere near, even this year before we adjourn for the summer, bringing in revenue in large enough quantity to pay the running expenses of our Government.

Here is an opportunity for us to put in this act an objective to which the Federal Reserve Board may look when they regulate the amount of currency. It will not be absolutely binding. I think no one will deny that the amount of currency, with all the other factors included, regulates largely the commodity-price level. The gold ounce is still the measure of the balance of trade as between nations. We cannot change that, but I think we are going to have a stalemate if we continue in the world trade and do not have a stabilized currency.

Mr. Chairman, I have formulated my thought on this subject and ask leave to include herewith the following extension of my remarks:

I repeat, I shall vote for the Goldsborough amendment to this bill because I am convinced that it is a commendable attempt to force the Federal Reserve Board to function in the interests of the great majority of the American people. I am not convinced that we are so far advanced that we will be satisfied to accept a currency issued solely on the credit of the Government. I am free to agree with many who have spoken on this bill that an interest-bearing Government bond is no better than a Government note, which we call currency. Both have behind them the credit and the taxing power of the United States, and they should be regarded by the people as of equal stability. However, we should never forget that the great mass of the people are governed by impressions and traditions, especially in regard to money, which some seem to regard as a sort of magic. The interests of the privileged few are best served by keeping the people in ignorance in regard to money. This same superstitious attitude has retarded progress in other respects. Some of the people are now learning economic lessons, but the number is not large. Often the press is either directly or indirectly controlled or influenced by a privileged group which profits from the existing system. It is very easy, indeed, for the disseminators of printed news, so much relied on by the average citizen, to create the general opinion that currency issued without something tangible behind it is fiat, and therefore not good, not valuable. In other words, I believe the favored ones of earth, who have controlled and still largely do control public affairs, can and will continue to mislead and misinform people, possibly because they themselves are not informed and progressive on the subject of money. It is, therefore, my judgment that the only safe and sane plan, at the present time, is to issue currency with a metal backing.

The last Treasury report of the date of May 4 shows that there is in the Treasury $8,725,377,902.50 of gold and $806,210,699.49 of silver. Using this metal as a 40-percent base, there can be issued against this metallic foundation $23,828,971,054.75 of currency. We have now outstanding in currency less than one-fourth of this amount. We of the Congress should commence next January an aggressive campaign to force the Treasury to issue this currency in place of selling bonds.

The Goldsborough amendment is an attempt to establish a commodity dollar. This commodity dollar would purchase a given quantity of a number of staple, basic commodities with a resulting change, within narrow limits, of the number of grains in the gold dollar which is to be the standard. The object is to assure that the same number of grains of gold will always purchase practically the same quantities of basic commodities. If this plan of currency can be made to work, it will regulate the prices of wheat, potatoes, cotton, and all the basic commodities used as the index.

It is certain that this country can never return to the straight gold standard which held sway for almost a third of a century. We have too great a proportion of the world's gold. The people are already educated to the fact that they do not need to use any gold, and can do with but a small quantity of silver for their ordinary daily transactions. For 60 years gold was in free circulation in the States bordering the Pacific. Those were days of great prosperity. It is now an accepted fact that all nations will hold all their gold in strong boxes as a base for currency. This is a decided advance toward a more rational money system.

In the light of the fact that we must have a "managed currency", I am willing to try the commodity dollar as defined and outlined in the Goldsborough amendment. Should this amendment fail to be adopted I shall vote for the banking bill, H. R. 7617, on final passage. I shall also vote for the Cross amendment because I believe the Federal Reserve banks should belong to and be a part of the United States Government. Should this amendment fail I will still vote for the original bill. My reason for support is the guarantee of permanence of the insurance of deposits in all banks in the System to $5,000, at least. It is my judgment that this insurance should be applied to all deposits and to all banks. However, I have discovered in my legislative career that we seldom get all we want in any bill, and I always welcome a movement in the right direction. Many a time I have accepted a thin slice when I have thought that those whom I represented were entitled to a full loaf.

I was startled when I read in the hearings on this bill that over 98 percent of those who have money on deposit in banks in the System are insured under this $5,000 limit, and that this insured 98 percent of depositors represents only about 40 percent of the money deposited. In other words, less than 2 percent of those who are fortunate enough to have bank deposits own nearly two-thirds of all the money on deposit in the banks of the System. I deeply regret that the original plan to force all banks into the Reserve System has not been carried out. It seems to me it would be a mistake to allow any nonmember bank to come under the insurance plan; hence I shall vote for the Hancock amendments.

I very vividly recall Bryan's third campaign for the Presidency 27 years ago this summer. At that time, guaranty of deposits in banks was incorporated into the Democratic platform. I remember campaigning the State of Oregon from one end to the other discussing, among other issues, the question of guaranteeing bank deposits. It was then considered freakish and somewhat unsound, but I believed in it. I have never changed my viewpoint since I became a convert to this plan, more than a quarter of a century ago. I belong to that group of men who have never been able to understand why William Jennings Bryan, when Secretary of State in President Wilson's cabinet in 1913, did not force a provision in the original Reserve Act guaranteeing bank deposits. It is freely stated by informed participants in the events of the day that, without Bryan's influence, the Federal Reserve Act could not have been passed at that time. Many of us believe that, had he thrown his full force and power behind the proposition of guaranteeing deposits, it would have been provided for in the original act. If such had been the case and deposits up to $5,000 had been guaranteed, how many ruined homes it would have saved!

Many of us are wondering whether there can be any permanent recovery in this country with such an unequal distribution of wealth in cash as is shown by the fact that less than 2 percent of the depositors hold more than two-thirds of the cash of the country. It is certainly true that this bill is a long, long step in the direction which we wish to take. It may take a generation to restore confidence among the people who were so thoroughly frightened that they withdrew one and a quarter billions from their savings accounts in banks and deposited the money with the Government in Postal Savings accounts where it is still held. It will be some time before the average person cashes his Postal Savings certificates and deposits his money in banks, even though the banks carry on their windows the words in which they now take pride, "deposits guaranteed." Those of us who fought so long to attain that status may be heartened now by the fact that people are willing to listen to the suggestion of a managed currency.

We are told that title II is the heart of this bill and that it is to be feared because it concentrates control of the Federal Reserve banks in the hands of the political party in power. I do not fear this. The term "political control" is used as a bogey to frighten the thoughtless. Why elect a party or a group to power and withhold from them the power and responsibility the people desired to delegate to them? Furthermore, where is the private control not influenced by politics and insidious pressure and greed? It is certain that the control of the finances of this country by the great House of Morgan and allied interests has brought disaster and wrecked the millions who trusted "big business." The Federal Reserve System should be Government owned and Government controlled. Title II brings that condition a little nearer and thus commands my support. At the present time the governor of each Federal Reserve bank is elected annually by the directors of that bank. Under the pending bill, the governor must be approved by the Federal Reserve Board. This is as it should be, making a unified System and bringing administration under one head. Each regional Federal Reserve bank should not be a separate unit, but an integral part of the System for which it acts as an agency. It is said that the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, with its power and importance, has dominated the Federal Reserve Board from the beginning. The thing created has grown so strong that it has managed and controlled its creator. It is contended that the governor of the Federal Reserve bank might not have as much independence and freedom if his election were made subject to approval by the Federal Reserve Board. That is true, and that is the way I believe it should be for the welfare of our banking system. The charge is made that the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board can be removed by the President. Why not? This appears perfectly reasonable to me, and on this point I take issue with many who have spoken on this floor, and freely say to you that I fear political control far less than I do selfish and unchecked private control. What could have been more cruel and heartless than the order from private control, after the election of President Harding, to deflate the country, call the farmers' loans, and sanction, favor, abet, and promote the loans and credit to the stock gamblers who brought on the crash of 1929?

The charge is made that open-market operations under this bill will be made by the Federal Reserve Board, and that Federal Reserve banks will be forced to buy and sell Government securities as ordered by the Federal Reserve Board. That is true, and precisely as I think it should be. We would have a calamity right now, a real disaster, facing us if Government securities were to fall 10 points or even less. The price of Government securities must be supported and maintained at all hazards.

I do not agree with the administration in its policy of spending more money than it takes in. I have no faith in the theory that this so-called "depression" is going to pass away in a few brief months. I think we are in a new era, a new world, and facing new conditions. I believe it is right and proper at this time to levy a tax which will bring sufficient money from the many available and unused sources to balance the Budget even in this year of great spending. Until that happy day comes when we can balance the Budget, I shall vote for every act that looks toward the support of the market value of Government securities.

Title III is devoted almost entirely to perfecting amendments, and nothing therein is at all serious from my viewpoint. I am, however, deeply disappointed that I have not, during my time in Congress, found here a better comprehension of the cause and cure of the great debacle which may have shattered the economic system which we have so enjoyed. Something has gone radically wrong. We have practically everything that anybody wants; practically all are willing to work to get their share, but the machinery is not working. The people need the manufactured articles which the factories are ready to fabricate, but the money necessary to buying power is withheld from circulation and use.

I am one of the group which believes that money and its control is largely to blame for the present-day failure. We can safely say that a very small percent of the people, probably less than 4 percent, enjoy more than 85 percent of the Nation's income. Figures vary, so I do not know which statement can be thoroughly relied upon, but it is true that a few have vastly more than they need, while practically one-sixth of our people are eating the bread of charity, and perhaps 10,000,000 are begging for the chance to work.

Nobody wants to wreck or ruin this civilization. The millions on the bread line do not want to destroy the electric current that furnishes light and power. They have no desire to roll into the ditches the tractors or the automobiles; but I think I can safely say for the unfortunate and suffering millions, that all they desire is the chance to work, to earn money for themselves and their dependents, so that they may all enjoy some of the blessings of this the most advanced of all civilizations. We cannot brush aside this unsolved problem. The solution must be found sometime. It will demand our attention again next winter. Ways and means must be found by which the millions of unhappy ones may have the chance which has been denied them by conditions over which they had no control.

For years I have said that interest and fixed dividends would be our undoing. It is now apparent that interest has certainly been one of the main causes of the wreckage which we seek to repair and to salvage. The determination of corporations and of individuals to collect dividends beyond right and reason and far beyond the ability of the people to pay will probably be numbered by the historian among the contributing factors to our great economic break. Think of a corporation like a telephone company, controlling a natural monopoly, fixing the prices of its services so high that it has drawn into its treasury assets of $5,000,000,000 within one brief lifetime! I hope some student of economic history will make a careful study of the influence of fixed and guaranteed dividends for monopoly.

Were the Hebrews right when they said all debts must be forgiven and canceled every 50 years? Were the ancients right when they said all interest was usury? It is often said that you cannot beat interest, and experience has proved this to be true. I have announced several times in this House that interest rates, if collected at all, should never be greater than the increase of wealth, when measured through a series of years. This increase I estimate to be about 2 percent.

I am told by a classical scholar, Dr. Arthur Patch McKinlay, of the University of California, that his researches indicate that the experiences of Greece and Rome may throw some light on the problems of debt and interest which have so troubled us that the very life of our Nation is imperiled. He points to the legislation of Solon at Athens and to the Licinian laws of Rome (377-357 B. C.), and the financial legislation of Caesar in 48 B. C. He says that Solon solved the problem by canceling all debts secured by mortgage or personal security and by inflating the currency. The Licinian laws provided that the principal of a loan should be reduced by the interest that had already been paid, and provided for liquidation of outstanding accounts, substituting the state for the private creditor. Caesar's legislation was the outcome of an orgy of speculation and deflation following the Second Punic War. It also allowed paid interest to be charged against the principal. He forced money into circulation in 11 days by limiting the amount of cash any person could hold.

Our responsibilities as Members of this House include study of problems of money and of interest. This bill offers the beginnings toward the solution which we shall work out carefully step by step.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. If I did not do so, I would do violence to my own best judgment of sound legislation, and my conception of the highly technical problem involved in the question of determining the true objective of monetary policy. I make no claims to expert knowledge on this subject; but my common-sense view of the problem forces me to record myself as being unalterably opposed to this amendment. I have thought of it and studied about it many, many hours. In my opinion the adoption of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH's amendment would not only be highly dangerous to the welfare of the country but would also quite likely make ineffective the exercise of the powers which Congress is conferring upon its agent, the Federal Reserve Board. Under his amendment the objective is so rigid and restrictive that, it would, in effect, place the board, in whom these powers are to be vested in a strait-jacket, and thereby seriously cripple the accomplishment of the greater objective. May I presume to suggest that you carefully follow my argument, which I believe will convince many of you that the mandate in the bill would not only tend to bring about, in coordination with the greater objective, the price stability which the supporters of the Goldsborough amendment are advocating but will also bring along with it stable employment and general business stability.

An objection that has been made to the bill, and particularly to the amended open-market provision, is that Congress should not increase the powers of the Federal Reserve Board without giving more definite directions as to how these powers shall be exercised. It is said that in the absence of such directions the Federal Reserve Board will not only possess all the instruments of monetary policy but will also determine its own objectives. It is further said that so long as the Federal Reserve Board has the power to determine its own objectives it cannot be considered to be solely an agency to carry out the will of Congress by using the machinery intrusted to it for achieving given objectives, but is a body with certain legislative powers that properly belong only to Congress. The question arises, however, whether a stable price level in itself is the objective to be aimed at or whether the real objective is stable production, employment, and trade, and the assurance of the largest possible national real income. This is aside from the question of the extent to which price stability can be achieved solely through monetary means, a question which, of course, is equally applicable to the broader objective of stable business conditions.

The principal reason, therefore, for opposing price stability as the objective of the Federal Reserve Board is that it would endanger the achievement of the broader and more desirable objective which is business stability.

In the first place, there is the difficulty of choosing what prices are to be included in the index. Let us first take a cost-of-living index. Such an index is proverbially insensitive. Many of the series in a cost-of-living index change hardly at all and in no degree commensurate with the violence of changes in prices and production. Business activity can change in one direction or the other and acquire considerable momentum before such changes are reflected in a cost-of-living index. It is therefore an unsatisfactory guide to monetary policy.

Sweden chose as an objective the stability of a cost-of-living index immediately after it departed from the gold standard. In a few months, however, the objective was broadened in the direction of creating as stable economic conditions as possible and to this end a rise in wholesale prices was favored. The insensitivity of a cost-of-living index is strikingly illustrated by Swedish experience in 1932-34. The index of production declined from 97 to 71 and then rose to 109, and yet the cost-of-living index remained practically stationary throughout the entire period.

Writers on this subject all appear to agree that you cannot stabilize both the level of wholesale prices and the cost of living. From 1913 to 1928 wholesale prices rose considerably more than retail prices. To make the same point in another way, if the retail-price level is stabilized, wholesale prices will fall, whereas if the wholesale-price level is stabilized, retail prices will rise. The explanation of this appears to be that a cost-of-living index includes more services the cost of which rise more rapidly in a progressive economy than the cost of mass production goods at wholesale.

Let us now consider stabilization of a wholesale-price index. This index has one advantage over a cost-of-living index—it is far more sensitive. It has, on the other hand, the disadvantage that it does not measure the purchasing power of money to consumers. There is no point in stabilizing the level of wholesale prices as an end in itself. Stabilization of wholesale prices can be justified only as a means to the end of stabilizing business. From this point of view various criticisms may be made.

In the first place let us assume that a rise in the price of some or all of our imports causes a rise in the wholesale-commodity-price index. In these circumstances it would appear unwise to adopt a restrictive monetary policy for the sole purpose of depressing domestic prices sufficiently to counterbalance the rise in the prices of imported goods in order to keep the general average stable. Such a policy might easily lead to a depression. Similarly, an expansive policy initiated because of a fall in the level which was due to a fall in the prices of imported goods might be unwise from the point of view of domestic stability.

Let us next consider a rise in the index brought about by higher agricultural prices following a crop failure. Because of a crop failure should we adopt a restrictive policy designed to force industrial prices down? It would appear that the proper policy to pursue in this case would be to permit the rise in the general index which is attributable to the rise in the prices of agricultural goods.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I gladly yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The gentleman will observe that if the commodity index of 1926 is used, then the index used is of all these basic commodities; so that the level and their production could rise or fall without any influence at all from the action of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. That might be true. But what method is to be employed in establishing the suitable index which is to be the basis of the price level after it has been attained?

Again it has been argued that any declines in the general index which are directly attributable to technological improvements or new discoveries should not call for an expansive monetary policy, since they are not deflationary in their effect.

There are technical problems in the compilation of indexes which affect their trustworthiness as guides to monetary policy. Different results are often obtainable by using a different weighting system. Thus, if a certain commodity or group is weighted heavily in the index, a rise in its price will cause the index to rise; if given little weight, variations in its price may not affect the index at all. Obviously monetary policy should not be dictated solely by changes in the method in which the index is constructed.

The consequences of a given price policy will differ according to the degree of flexibility or rigidity in the economy and according to the role that international trade plays in each economy. Monetary writers have a tendency to minimize the qualifications and modifications necessitated by changes in such factors. Those who formulate policy, however, cannot afford to do so. We are just beginning to realize the extent to which rigidities of prices have crept into our system and the importance of such rigidities in explaining fluctuations in production and employment. We have not as yet grasped the full implications to monetary policy of the lessening flexibility of our system.

It should again be emphasized that we should be interested in stable prosperity rather than in stable prices. How many of us, for example, would be satisfied with stable prices while 20,000,000 people were on the relief rolls? England had a stable level of commodity prices in the 4 years 1931-34, and yet had over 2,000,000 unemployed during all that period. One might meet this objection by postponing the inauguration of a stable price policy until after full employment has been achieved, but this does not really meet it. Rapid technological improvements introduced by monopolists might displace a lot of workers, while resulting in no fall in the general price level, and in this case we would have increasing unemployment under conditions of stable prices.

Finally, there is the insuperable difficulty at a time like the present of choosing the particular level at which prices should be stabilized. The 1926 level is most frequently mentioned, perhaps because that was regarded as a year of normal prosperity. But it would be exceedingly rash to affirm that because a certain state of business activity corresponded at one time with a certain level of prices, therefore, it is only necessary to restore that level in order to restore the same state of business activity. A lot of water has gone over the dam since 1926. Wage rates have changed, interest rates have changed, indebtedness has changed, our international position has changed, and much progress in the methods of production has occurred. It might be hazarded that full employment could be obtained at a lower level than that of 1926, and if this were so, a policy designed to reach that level would result in a boom. It should be remembered that the 1926 level was higher than the 1929 level. On the other hand, it is conceivable that stable prosperity could only be achieved with a level of prices higher than 1926. The point is that nobody knows nor has the means of knowing what the level of prices will be when we have regained a state of stable prosperity. It is interesting to surmise if the fact that the Bureau of Labor Statistics, for purely technical reasons, changed the base of their index from 1913 to 1926, has anything to do with the choice of 1926 as a desirable level. If it had not done so, the index for 1926 would have been 151, which does not look nearly as desirable as an even 100.

In conclusion, let it be again emphasized that the opposition to stable commodity prices as an objective of monetary policy is solely because it is not believed that stable prices need always correspond with stable prosperity. Since it is the latter that we are really interested in, why not say so? If Congress wishes to give the Federal Reserve Board more specific directions than are contained in the present act—and there can be but few here who do not favor expressing a definite mandate for their guidance in this bill—we should adopt the amendment in section 11 of the act, which is clear, definite, and workable with respect to the duties and powers of the Federal Reserve Board, reading as follows, and vote down the Goldsborough amendment:

It shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to exercise such powers as it possesses to promote conditions conducive to business stability and to mitigate by its influence unstabilizing fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices, and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action and credit administration.

It would meet the objections we have enumerated to a rigidly stable level of commodity prices by allowing the Federal Reserve Board some discretion in its handling of each situation, while at the same time emphasizing the main objective the Board should and must keep before it. No two business situations are ever alike or represent the same combinations of factors. Each new business situation is in large part a new problem. Hence no rigid or nondiscretionary rule can ever hope to provide the correct solution of a succession of ever-changing problems.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the House to the fact the original bill submitted to this body, which became our present Federal Reserve law, contained this very provision and was stricken out by the action of this House, to the very great misfortune of this country. There has been an effort during all the years since then to reinstate this idea. The thought at that time was that the Federal Reserve Board was being given full power along this line, and they did have the full power if they had cared to assert it. Unfortunately, little by little they gave up the power which the Congress had given into their hands and permitted the misuse of the Federal Reserve System and the Federal Reserve idea.

Mr. Chairman, the thing I desire to speak on most at the present time is the fact we are talking here as if we are going back to the gold standard. Not a chance in the world if we retain our sanity.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The original Goldsborough bill passed the House by a vote of 289 to 60, and this provision was stricken in the Senate, not in the House.

Mr. KELLER. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to that fact. This very bill passed the House by a vote of 289 to 60, but was defeated in the Senate because some Senator did not understand just what it meant. [Laughter.]

Another thing I want to get over to you is that when you talk about a standard and what is back of money, there is not any such thing. There is nothing back of our money since we went off the gold standard, and we do not need any—thing back of our money except the law. The truth of the matter is the only dollar we have is the dollar that is made by law. The law-created dollar is the only dollar we have. We ought to understand that perfectly, because our American gold dollar that had 23.22 grains to each dollar under the gold-standard law varied from 219 cents down to as low as 59.8 cents in value. Let us get that perfectly clear. Now, what does that mean? It simply means if we go to work and use a yardstick that varied from 21 inches to 79 inches long we would have exactly the same variation in measurement that we have had in the measurement of values by permitting the value of the dollar to vary.

Mr. Chairman, the Goldsborough amendment will give us stabilization. The man who does not understand what stabilization means ought to try to find out what the great authorities on that subject have to say about it. We have to come to stabilization some time or other. You can no longer have your dollar value now up and now down without again and again destroying business, as has been so often done by that means in the past.

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. REILLY. Under the terms of the bill now, cannot the Board indulge in stabilization?

Mr. KELLER. Under the terms of the bill the Board might or might not, just as it pleased. But I am sick and tired of trying to have something done by some board that will do what it pleases, when it is the gentleman's duty and my duty and the duty of every Member here to tell them just exactly what we want them to do. I am not going to submit to that any longer without raising my voice in opposition. That is our business and not the business of some board.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. For a question; yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. Does not the gentleman think Congress ought to take charge and perform its constitutional duty?

Mr. KELLER. I do.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Yes; of course.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am pleased to hear the gentleman say that. I have been waiting a long time to hear him say that, but that was not my purpose in rising. I understood the gentleman to say that our money at the present time is good because of the fiat of Congress making it good.

Mr. KELLER. Certainly it is; and you have not any other kind of money at the present time except fiat money, law-created money.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I remind the gentleman that the ability on the part of this Board to stabilize depends upon gold being behind this dollar?

Mr. KELLER. It does not, of course, depend on gold being behind this dollar at all. The gentleman forgets that we are and for sometime have been off the gold standard. That no gold is obtainable and no gold is being used for money except to pay or receive international trade balances. Will the gentleman not get clearly in mind what I said a minute ago, that gold never has had stable value itself? A standard is a thing that does not vary. Anything that does vary, of course, is not a standard. And gold always fluctuates in value.

May I not call attention again to the kinds of money we now have—greenbacks, pure fiat; bank notes founded on Government bonds, themselves pure fiat; Federal Reserve notes, based not on gold—not one penny, but on notes, bonds, bills of lading, every bit fiat; not a penny of gold behind it. The only nonflat money we have, the only redemption money left is our little bit of silver.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not claim to be a constitutional lawyer, but I may say to the members of this Committee today that after I read speeches made by men who do claim to be constitutional lawyers on questions such as the one we have before us today, then I rather assume that in a small degree I have a similar right.

I may say, briefly, on the question of the constitutionality of this bill as it exists today, that I challenge any lawyer in the House of Representatives to now point out to me wherein there is any delegation of any legislative authority or any other authority in the lines from 4 to 10, inclusive, on page 51. In the words of a distinguished member of the committee, it is simply a stump speech, setting out what the policy of Congress is with reference to stabilizing business and commodity prices in the United States.

Men say here today that they do not want to delegate the powers of Congress to a board. I ask you this question: The great volume of money in the United States today is what? It is bankers' money, it is credit money, and until you regulate that by the Government itself you cannot regulate the value of the dollar by any control of the price of gold and silver. You must regulate credit, and I may say this to the gentleman from Maryland—and no one in the House has more respect for the gentleman than I have—if he would introduce a bill taking over the Federal Reserve System entirely by the Government, I would be pleased to follow him [applause], but I think this bill and the Goldsborough amendment are merely camouflage when it comes to revesting in the Congress or putting back in the hands of the Government the right to regulate the value of the dollar in this country.

I say this in opposition to the amendment. We adopted the Gold Reserve Act last year. We adopted the Silver Purchase Act last year. They are monetary bills and that is monetary legislation establishing the monetary policy of this Government, and any interference with those policies by the enactment of the Goldsborough amendment, in my opinion, would be a very sad mistake today.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Has the gentleman any specific information that would lead him to believe that any of these delegated authorities having an unlimited nature that the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses enacted on monetary questions are ever going to be used by the party to whom they were given? Let us declare a policy.

Mr. MURDOCK. In answer to the gentleman's question and to my silver friends on the floor of the House today, let me call attention to this fact: Under the Silver Purchase Act which we enacted in the last Congress, we have boosted the silver price up to 77 cents, as compared with about 37 cents when the act was passed. I ask the silver men here today and the men coming from silver States, how can you afford to place the control of the price of silver back in the hands of the bankers after you have seen the price boosted from 37 cents up to where it is today?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think, from what I know about the situation, that the Goldsborough amendment will work, and I wish to give my reason why I think it will not work. Great Britain—the British Empire—and those countries that are in what is called "sterling area", are developing a unit of value that is controlled within its limits by the buying and selling of exchange and gold and silver. In other words, the Bank of England has set up a paper unit of value and is manipulating it in the foreign exchange markets of the world to keep that unit of value within certain limits.

I have said before on the floor of this House that the Bank of England is basing that unit of value upon the 1913 price level. If you will examine the chart, you will see that that price level has gone along for the last 4 years.

As I get it from reading this Goldsborough amendment, we are going to set up the same scheme they are using in England, and where are we going to get off? Instead of going to the 1926 price level we will go back to the 1913 price level in competition with Great Britain. She will bring us back to that price level, and with the result that the producing classes, yea, indeed, producers throughout the world, will be in bondage for years to come, and the depression and unemployment will continue with unabated vigor.

I am for stability of the exchanges, but in our own interest and not in the interest of the Bank of England crowd.

If you pass the Goldsborough amendment you are going to have a conflict. You are going to try to establish the United States dollar on the 1926 level and the pound sterling on the 1913 price level. Instead of making conditions better in the world you are going to make them more chaotic if you pass this amendment.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Certainly.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The monetary policy of England that will control the price level in England cannot control the internal price level of our country.

Mr. FIESINGER. I will say this: When we sell products of which we produce an exportable surplus, like cotton, wheat, hogs, and so forth, I say to you that England can control the internal policy of this country as to those commodities.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that when the Executive fixed the price of gold, commodities did not continue to rise.

Mr. FIESINGER. I do not agree to that proposition. I think there were other causes.

Mr. FIESINGER. While we are on the subject of gold, I should like to offer some observations with the hope of clarifying some of our thinking. Not many days ago I received a letter from a very worthy gentleman asking the question if the world had not abandoned or was about to abandon gold. My answer to him was that it is a mistake to think that the world has abandoned or will abandon gold. The use of gold may be changed or shifted, but its abandonment does not seem possible or plausible or even desirable. Responsible thought in this country has no such thing in mind, and surely the gold-block countries do not so intend, even though they may be forced, as we were, to abandon gold redemption. England is not abandoning gold but merely shifting its use. As I said before, England is experimenting with a bank-controlled paper monetary unit, using gold to stabilize the same. In other words, the paper pound is the end and gold is the means. This requires short explanation. Bank of England notes, expressed in terms of British currency, are dealt in in every foreign-exchange market in the world, just as, for instance, United States Steel stock is dealt in on the New York Stock Exchange. A pool, if it has enough money, under ordinary circumstances may put the stock up or down, or keep it within narrow limits as to price. In England there is a large pool called the "stabilization fund" operating with gold or gold equivalents in all the foreign-exchange markets of the world buying and selling British bank-note money, with the object in view of keeping it within very narrow limits as to purchasing power. Since the inauguration of this pool some 4 years ago England has maintained the purchasing power of the pound sterling over commodities in accordance with the 1913 price level, as revealed by her Board of Trade Wholesale Commodity Price Index. In other words, she uses gold and gold equivalents to stabilize her paper unit of value. This means a stabilized unit of value held in place by unstabilized gold. What the United States and the gold-block countries require is stabilized gold, because their currencies are tied to fixed weights of gold, which with increased or decreased purchasing power throws out of adjustment commodities and property which are measured by it, creating confusion in the financial and business world, resulting in hesitant business with unemployment consequences.

Thus you will observe a conflicting fundamental difference between the countries, namely, the United States and gold-bloc countries, whose currencies are tied to a fixed weight of gold, which, of course, are interested, or should be interested, in stabilized gold so their currencies may not vary in purchasing power, and those countries headed by England which have set up a paper unit of value which is controlled by gold which makes for unstable gold. So the issue between the aforesaid groups of countries is stabilized gold against unstabilized gold, and if you are to stabilize gold, then there immediately arises another issue—at what point in purchasing power should gold be stabilized? Whether we shall have high gold or low gold? The interest of the United States is low gold, gold of the buying power of 1926; gold of the debt-paying power of 1926. We have, or have to have, that if we are going to have high wages and high prices for farm commodities, and these we have to have if we are going to sustain our former wealth structure, keep our business solvent, and pay our governmental debts and taxes which were geared to the 1926 level of prices. England and the other European countries, on the other hand, are interested in high gold. This statement should perhaps be qualified. The banking, manufacturing, and gold-mining interests are interested in high gold. England and her colonies produce about 80 percent of all the gold in the world, and naturally want high prices for it. The manufacturing interests want low manufacturing costs, which include low labor and raw-material costs, so they can penetrate the markets of the world, and banking follows in its interest, commerce. These interests seem to predominate over labor and producers of prime or unmanufactured commodities whose interest is, or should be, low gold. So the predominant groups in those countries seem to want high gold with the 1913 price level.

Let me state again the issues involved in the world depression and consequent of unemployment:

First. Stabilized against unstabilized gold.

Second. High gold against low gold.

What most people do not seem to see is that our currency system is related to every other currency system in the world and every other currency system is related to our own currency system. What the world needs and is crying for is a denominator common to all currencies, and that denominator must be consistent with changed conditions in the world as a result of the World War. It should be so geared to cure the tremendous debt disease which hangs heavily upon the productive effort of the world. Many people do not think in terms of gold and shrink from it as something incomprehensible, and maybe unimportant. They think in terms of national currencies and fail to recognize its supreme importance as the world's yardstick of measurement. They are willing to leave it to others to manipulate its value and pursue its tyrannical course.

No tyrant in all the world has ever caused the tragedy and suffering of unstabilized and high gold. This unregulated tyrant has wrecked the hopes of millions of mankind and caused more human suffering than the World War, yet for the want of a better device I would restore it as a common denominator for currencies and strip it of its power to destroy the business and commerce of the world. My suggestion would be: (1) Establish in the United States a free market for gold and silver; (2) to stabilize gold in the interest of the United States. Set up a definite monetary use for silver taken in under the Silver Act of 1934 by issuing against same storage receipts or certificates of deposit exactly the equivalent of old gold certificates, make said certificates legal tender, and redeem in silver at its world-accepted value.

Mr. CROSSER of Ohio and Mr. REILLY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. There are 5 minutes remaining. The Chair will ask unanimous consent of the Committee that he be permitted to divide the remaining 5 minutes between the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. CROSSER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, it is, of course, axiomatic that a stable standard of value is necessary in any sound monetary system. It is also elementary that any system in which money has intrinsic value is unsound, for it means that the value of all commodities is measured in terms of the commodity of which such money consists.

The true nature of money is that it is a certificate by public authority that the person to whom such money may, have been issued has given commodities or service amounting in value to the number of units of value indicated by said certificate, commonly called money.

The average value of all commodities, in which the public deals, should be the basis on which the unit of value should be established. If that principle were constantly observed neither deflation nor inflation would be possible.

The Goldsborough amendment would do much to establish a stable standard of value and therefore a scientific monetary system, and I favor it for that reason and shall support it.

The Goldsborough amendment requires that stability of the value of money shall be maintained and stipulates means for accomplishing this purpose. This is the stipulation of a policy and it is the proper function and constitutional duty of Congress to determine such policy. It is entirely proper and desirable to delegate to the designated administrative agency authority to carry into execution such policy and to determine the details for doing so.

I should like to see the Goldsborough amendment go further, but it is a long step in the right direction.

I, therefore, earnestly urge the Members of the House to support and vote for the Goldsborough amendment. It will, in my opinion, mean much for the American people. The benefits which will certainly result from the establishment of the principle involved in the Goldsborough amendment will lead ultimately to the adoption of a truly scientific system of money. [Applause.]

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment. [Applause.] It gives me quite a lot of pleasure to sit here this afternoon and hear you attorneys debate this money question. Since I have been here I find about 4 farmers in this Congress and 1 banker. That leaves 430 lawyers. Go back into the history of this country to the first President of the Nation and you will find that he was a farmer, and the people who wrote the Constitution and signed the Declaration of Independence were mostly farmers.

A nation has grown up in this country in late years that when a farmer and his wife had a boy who they thought was a little smarter than the rest of them, the first thing they did was spoil him by making an attorney out of him. [Laughter and applause.] They have been making the laws here for a generation or two, and after making the laws about the first thing they have to do in order to decide what the law is, they call in about 12 farmers to tell them what the law means. [Applause and laughter.]

Now, I say it is about time to listen to the farmers when you are making some of these laws. There are only 4 of us farmers in this Congress, but there are about 40,000,000 farmers out in the country that want this Goldsborough amendment. Yes; 40,000,000 farm folks want this amendment. The Farm Bureau, the Farmers' Union, the Grange, and other farm organizations are supporting this amendment. The so-called "experts" who so often appear before the Committee on Banking and Currency have engineered this present money system and the banking laws for years. It is about time you listened to somebody else, because they have got us into all kinds of trouble under this banking system.

The other day I attempted to tell you about the troubles the farmers are in. They are still in this trouble.

This bill does not go far enough. The Government should take over the Federal Reserve Banking System and control the money and credit of this Nation. However, this Goldsborough amendment will give us some relief, because it will establish prices as on an average between 1921 and 1929. Remember back in 1893 to 1896, the big banking crowd caused a panic by deflating the currency and credit and cleaned up farmers of this Nation. Generally, since that time the farmers were getting along fairly well as money and credit seemed to be more or less stabilized up until 1920. Since then even more power and control has come into the hands of this bunch of racketeers and whenever the farmers get a little foothold, this same crowd comes along and kicks them off, just as they have been doing lately. So you should get away from that kind of a money and banking system. You cannot start this country going again as long as people are afraid that this same gang of money sharks will knock down the prices and deflate values. Who wants to buy any property and put in 15 or 20 years building up a little home or a farm, then have this same crowd come along and deflate the currency and make this property worth about 50 cents on the dollar and perhaps take your property away from you. [Applause.] This Goldsborough amendment would stabilize the value of the dollar and would stabilize prices so if you built a home you would be able to keep it without losing it every 15 to 20 years as now happens under this present banking system.

I hope you Congressmen will support this amendment. While I appreciate that not many of you are farmers, I know that many of you were born and raised on the farm, and if enough of you have not forgotten the conditions under which you were reared, this amendment will pass. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BUCKLER] has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I think the fundamental difference between the position taken by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], and the position taken by a majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency can be expressed in a very few words. The main purpose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland is to enable people who are in debt and who went in debt in 1926 and previous years to pay their debts with the same kind of dollar that they borrowed. I think that is the real purpose back of the Goldsborough amendment. I think the idea of a majority of the committee—and I number myself upon this particular issue with them—is that we ought to attempt to stabilize the medium of exchange; that we should stabilize our money.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I am sorry, but I do not have time.

We have endeavored to meet this debt situation by reducing interest, and we have reduced interest to a considerable degree, to the farmer, to the home owner, and to the industrialist. It has succeeded. At the present time money is one of the cheapest commodities in the United States. If you will recall 3 or 4 days or perhaps a week ago, in New York the banks refused to pay further interest on depositors' balances. I realize that a great many demands for money are not met at the present time, but it is usually because the propositions placed before the people who have the money are too uncertain. What we want to do at the present time is to try to assure the business public so that they will go ahead.

With that distinction in mind, that difference between the administration's measure and the Goldsborough measure, let us analyze them. The Goldsborough amendment says that it shall be the policy of the United States to restore the price level—and it means the price level of 1926. In the first place, I do not think it can be done, because the only lever that can be used, that I know anything about or that we ever heard anything about in the Committee on Banking and Currency, is to cheapen money. Money is cheap at the present time as far as interest rates are concerned.

I believe, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] has often said himself, that you cannot push a string. We can pull it. We can restrict. We can raise the bank reserve requirements and restrict money. That should have been done in 1929, but was not done. However, it is most difficult to encourage people. I say the only way you can encourage them is by using the power which is given in the amendment which the committee made to the banking bill. That is to stabilize the medium of exchange.

I want to read that language to you because I think it has largely been lost sight of in the speeches which have been made:

It shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to exercise its powers in such manner as to promote conditions conducive to business stability and to eliminate unstabilizing fluctuations in prices.

We cannot go back to 1926. We must look to the future.

The way to encourage business is to assure the country that through the powers of the Federal Reserve Board we will now have a stable medium of exchange. When we have convinced the public of this, business will go ahead with greater confidence.

I think I have made clear this issue raised by the amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, the doctrine just preached by the gentleman from Michigan, in my opinion, would sound the death knell of hope for the farmers and the home owners of America, who have been struggling for all these years against this man-made depression. I said on the floor of the House in 1929 that we were in a money panic and that we never would get out of it until we expanded the currency to raise commodity price levels to what they were in 1926. We have gone on for 6 years and have spent billions of dollars, but we are still in that depression; and I make the prediction now that we will not get out of it until we raise commodity price levels to what they were in 1926 and then stabilize them. [Applause.]

The Goldsborough amendment may not go far enough, but it certainly is going in the right direction.

The gentleman from Michigan talks about stabilizing prices at their present level and turning our financial system over to the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. It is not the same Board.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, I know. It is like the Irishman who had a horsefly after him, but thought it was a bumblebee. He said: "You have changed your suit, but I know your voice." [Laughter.] It is the same system. After all, you are really turning our financial system back into the hands of private bankers to expand or contract our currency at will. It is dangerous in the extreme.

Back in 1914 they began to expand the currency through the Federal Reserve banks, and then contracted it with disastrous results.

Talk about inflation! Why, they expanded the currency more than $1,000,000,000 from 1914 to 1920. Commodity prices went up, and while they were at that high level we contracted our debts, floated bonds, and levied taxes. You are now attempting to wring from the American people money to meet those obligations by stabilizing prices at the present level, a much lower level. The great financial interests of the country contracted the currency down to what it was in 1914, and since that time they have been demanding of the American people the impossible thing of paying their debts on these depressed prices, paying the debts incurred in a time of inflation which the financial interests brought about themselves.

My honest opinion is that there is no politics among big bankers. You talk about a big Democratic banker or a big Republican banker, but both have the same object in view. [Applause.] If you turn this matter over to them, it is my opinion you will have a repetition of what you had heretofore; and if you stabilize farm prices and property prices at their present levels, we will never get out of this panic. There is nothing that would do more harm to the people of this country, the home owners, the property owners, the farmers, the merchants, the small-business men—nothing that would so retard our recovery as to stabilize prices at their present levels.

The great financiers knew what was taking place before the panic. In 1926, 1927, 1928, and 1929 the Federal Reserve Board was virtually financing the jamboree on the stock market. The little fellow knew nothing about it until the crash came. Those who profited invested their profits in tax-exempt securities, in Government bonds, and are now demanding that we pay them on the present price levels. It simply cannot be done. Now they come in and ask us to stabilize prices at their present level by the one method that can be controlled, and that is through an expansion or contraction of the circulating medium.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. How does the gentleman reach the conclusion that the bill undertakes to stabilize prices at their present levels? It is contrary to the language and entirely foreign to the purpose.

Mr. RANKIN. Because the gentleman to the left of the gentleman from North Carolina said so in his speech. That is what I am going by.

Mr. STEAGALL. No; I did not say that.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Michigan said "stabilize prices."

Mr. STEAGALL. But not at their present levels.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Michigan said we could not get back to the 1926 levels; and I say that unless we do, we will never get out of the depression.

I hope the Goldsborough amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Chairman, I have a good deal of diffidence in discussing this particular provision of the banking bill of 1935, where the issue is between the present delegation of what I believe to be administrative powers, and the delegation of legislative powers. Probably I should not rise at this time were it not for the fact that as a result of remarks I made in general debate upon this bill, a few days ago, some newspaper, although I did not suppose they would dignify my opinion to that extent, represented me as saying I favored the Goldsborough amendment, and I have been asked about it a number of times this morning.

I am opposed to the Goldsborough amendment, although I have the greatest respect for the ability of its author, and the greatest admiration for his very profound knowledge of money, and the great amount of time he has spent in research on this subject.

I am afraid to tie the hands of the Federal Reserve Board in its control over the administrative functions which the Congress is delegating to them. There is no use talking about this being a government of law and not a government of men, for when we delegate any duty, any function, its administration must be intrusted to men; and men may administer it efficiently or men may administer it inefficiently. There is no use quibbling about that, we have got to face these problems as realities. I am afraid at this time to tie the hands of the Federal Reserve Board, because I do not believe anybody is wise enough to know at what level we should stabilize prices, or to what commodity prices we should tie the dollar.

I am afraid it would render our monetary control impotent and helpless in dealing with foreign trade and in competing with England and Japan; therefore I am opposed to the amendment at this time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEAGALL and Mr. McFARLANE) there were—ayes 101, noes 114.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers. Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. STEAGALL and Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 122, noes 128.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: On page 51, line 1, strike out paragraph (b), beginning in line 1, and all through line 10 on that page.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I propose by this amendment to strike out the same language that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] proposed to strike out; however, in its place I propose to insert nothing because nothing belongs at that place in the bill.

According to the statements of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], and many others who have discussed this bill and the amendment, this particular language is unconstitutional. Frankly, I agree with those who have spoken along the line that this particular language is unconstitutional. It is a delegation of authority to the Federal Reserve Board to do what it pleases with a certain proposition. It is a delegation of authority that is bound to get us into trouble. Many of those who have spoken here today agree that a delegation of authority is bad, and that it is time that the Members of this House stopped delegating authority. [Applause.]

That view is shared by many of those on the majority side of the aisle. Mr. Chairman, let us have the courage of our convictions. Let us not be led astray by those who have framed up legislation and brought it in here which means something in the nature of a surrender of our powers, if we had the right to surrender them. Let us vote to strike this language from the bill. No two men can agree as to the interpretation of this language. It makes a mess of the whole legislation. If you have not read it, bear with me just a moment while I call attention to its essential points:

It shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve Board to exercise such powers as it possesses in such manner as to promote conditions conducive to business stability.

And so forth.

Mr. Chairman, that is just a mess. Can we not stop at this time passing unconstitutional legislation which is just getting us into trouble, legislation which is destroying American liberty and preventing business recovery? We do not want a lot of legislation passed here that is going to destabilize business and destabilize banking more than already has happened.

Mr. Chairman, one of the troubles with the banking situation today is lack of confidence. This will create more of that situation. What we are up against is that every year there is being drawn out of the vitals of business, 10, 12, or 14 percent of the bank loans that are outstanding of a commercial character. If we pass more legislation to create more instability we will create a greater deflation and greater distress. That is the trouble. Oh, that the Members here would take their responsibility seriously and stop passing legislation to prevent business recovery. Let us strike out this language and start along the way of perfecting this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 33, noes 55.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. STEAGALL and Mr. TABER to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 68, noes 85.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 205. Effective 90 days after the enactment of this act, section 12A of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 12A. (a) There is hereby created an Open Market Advisory Committee (hereinafter referred to as the 'committee'), which shall consist of five representatives of the Federal Reserve banks. The members of the committee and an alternate to serve in the absence of each of them shall be elected annually by the governors of the 12 Federal Reserve banks in accordance with procedure prescribed by regulations of the Federal Reserve Board. Vacancies shall be filled in the same manner. The terms of the members of the committee shall expire at the end of each calendar year, and a person elected to fill a vacancy shall serve for the remainder of the term of his predecessor. The committee shall elect its own chairman. Meetings of the committee shall be held from time to time upon the call of the chairman or upon the call of the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board. Meetings shall be called whenever requested by a majority of members of the committee or by a majority of the members of the Federal Reserve Board.

"(b) The committee shall consult and advise with, and make recommendations to, the Federal Reserve Board from time to time with regard to the open-market policy of the Federal Reserve System. The committee shall also aid in the execution of open-market policies adopted from time to time by the Federal Reserve Board and shall perform such other duties relating thereto as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe. The Federal Reserve Board shall consult the committee before making any changes on its own initiative in the open-market policy, in the rates of interest or discount to be charged by the Federal Reserve banks, or in the reserve balances required to be maintained by member banks.

"(c) After consulting with and considering the recommendations of the committee, the Federal Reserve Board, from time to time, shall prescribe the open-market policy of the Federal Reserve System. Each Federal Reserve bank shall purchase or sell obligations of the United States, bankers' acceptances, bills of exchange, and other obligations of the kinds and maturities made eligible for purchase under the provisions of section 14 of this act to such extent and in such manner as may be required by the Federal Reserve Board in order to effectuate the open-market policies adopted by the Board from time to time under the provisions of this section and each Federal Reserve bank shall cooperate fully, in every way, in making such policies effective.

"(d) All transactions of Federal Reserve banks under authority of section 14 of this act shall be subject to such regulations, limitations, and restrictions as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLLISTER: Page 51, line 11, strike out all of section 205.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, this motion is to strike out all of section 205 and, in my opinion, raises the most important issue that could be presented to the committee this afternoon. It involves the compulsory provision for the participation by Federal Reserve banks in open-market operations.

At the present time there is no way in which Federal Reserve banks may be forced to use their resources in the purchase of Government obligations or any other kind of obligations, and there is no way in which they may be forced to sell such obligations. At the present time it is provided that when an advisory committee makes certain recommendations as to open-market operations, they shall be passed on to the Federal Reserve Board which may or may not approve them; but if approved, the final result is passed on to the various Federal Reserve banks which may then decide whether or not they care to participate.

Now, open-market operations do not necessarily refer to Government bonds. They may also refer to the buying and selling of certain other kinds of obligations, but we generally think of them as dealing with the Government-bond market.

If this bill becomes effective, it will be possible for the Federal Reserve Board, acting by a bare majority of a quorum or by three members, to compel every Federal Reserve bank in the country—all the 12 regional banks—to use their resources in buying Government bonds, and since New York is the place where bonds are customarily bought, these operations will be through the New York Federal Reserve Bank. Thus the New York Federal Reserve Bank will drain the credit resources of the country to New York and they will there be used to acquire Government bonds, or in the event the operation is the other way, they will sell them for the account of the various banks.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. Inasmuch as the bill already provides for open-market operations by the Federal Reserve Board, does not the gentleman think it advisable that they should have a chance to confer with the Federal Reserve banks as to what they should do?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I do not understand the gentleman at all.

Mr. REILLY. The bill as now written provides for open-market operations.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Compulsory open-market operations.

Mr. REILLY. By the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Yes.

Mr. REILLY. Does not the gentleman think it advisable that before they exercise such tremendous powers as the gentleman thinks they have, they should have an opportunity to confer with the representatives of the Federal Reserve banks as to the wisdom of such action?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I think it is very desirable.

Mr. REILLY. Then why does the gentleman want to strike that out of the bill?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman has completely misunderstood my motion. My motion is to strike out the section entirely which not only strikes out the provisions for the advisory committee but also strikes out the compulsory provisions which require Federal Reserve banks to buy such bonds when they may not want to do so.

Mr. REILLY. Under the law as now written, the Federal Reserve Board can have open-market operations just as provided by the bill.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman completely misunderstands the law at the present time.

Mr. REILLY. I beg the gentleman's pardon; they have used open-market operations.

Mr. HOLLISTER. If the gentleman will consult the law, he will find that at the present time the only way a Federal Reserve bank enters into open-market operations is at its own desire and its own willingness.

Mr. REILLY. That is true.

Mr. HOLLISTER. And there is no possible way by which a Federal Reserve bank today may be compelled, against its will, to enter into open-market operations.

Mr. FIESINGER rose.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I must decline to yield further, because there is one more point I want to make. If I then have additional time, I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

I want to point out the sinister shadow that lurks behind this authority that is granted the Federal Reserve Board. I want to bring out as clearly as I can to the members of the Committee what it means when Government bonds may be forced on unwilling buyers.

The whole theory of the sale of Government bonds to the investors of the country is that of a free market, the same kind of free market in which private obligations of corporations are sold to investors. The maturity, the taxable situation, and the rate of interest all enter into whether or not a buyer is willing to acquire bonds from the Government. When the time ever comes that the Government is able to force its bonds on unwilling buyers, there is no difference between that situation and the issuing of fiat money. Fiat money, as you all know, is money which has absolutely nothing behind it except a promise, and fiat money is, in a way, a forced loan when it is forced on people who do not want to take it. That is the trouble with greenbacks; it is the trouble with printing-press money which we have discussed so much, because it is forced down the throats of those who do not want to take it. When this happens the value of such money goes steadily down and the cost of living goes proportionately up. I maintain that when the Government is in a position to compel the Federal Reserve banks of the country, against their will, against the wisdom of sound bankers, against the wishes of those who realize what it means—when it is in a position to compel these banks to take such bonds we might just as well face the facts and finance these continuing deficits by the issuance of fiat money, because both are a forced loan.

Mr. Chairman, the one thing which free people have fought since the beginning of time is the forcing of loans down their throats by the government, and if we give this power to the Federal Reserve Board we are giving the power to commandeer the savings of the people for a loan by the Government, which, in ordinary times, they would not be willing to take.

Now, the worst of it is, when we issue printing-press money, fiat money, greenbacks, or whatever you call it, the people know what we are doing—they know that the printing presses are at work. When we are working through machinery of this kind, telling the Federal banks to take bonds which they do not want to take, we are running by one of the great danger signals of inflation, because the people at large do not realize what is happening.

I say that if there is one amendment that should be made to this bill, it is the taking out of this section, taking out the provision which permits the Federal Board to compel Federal banks to take Federal obligations. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the law at present provides that the open-market operations of the Federal Reserve System are directed first by an open-markets committee representing 12 Reserve banks. They are the governors of the 12 Federal Reserve banks, and they initiate the policies.

Any plan adopted by the open-market committee must have the approval of the Federal Reserve Board. But there is no power, either in the open-market committee or in the Federal Reserve Board, to require any member bank to carry out any policy that may be inaugurated or promulgated.

The purpose of the provision in the pending bill is to fix this responsibility definitely and to place it in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board, who are the servants of the people of the United States.

Under existing law there is no power to compel any bank to follow any policy, even though it may be approved by 11 Federal Reserve banks and the Federal Reserve Board.

As the law is now, it is within the power of 1 bank to nullify any policy adopted by the other 11 banks and the Federal Reserve Board.

It is a question of whether we shall have policies that affect the welfare of the Nation as a whole determined by the Federal Reserve Board, representing the people of the United States, or a confused authority resting partly in the hands of the bankers and partly in the Federal Reserve Board, without the power to put it in execution, and leave it in the power of 1 Federal Reserve bank to nullify the action of the Federal Reserve Board and 11 other Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. There is some confusion as to the powers of the open-market committee?

Mr. STEAGALL. The Federal Reserve Board controls discount rates. Under the pending bill the Board would be given power to control the purchase of securities in the open market on the lowering or raising of reserve requirements.

Mr. FIESINGER. And in the set-up of this machinery it puts no injunction on the buying of specific securities?

Mr. STEAGALL. Absolutely not.

Mr. FIESINGER. And they can buy and sell as much as they see fit?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; so long as Federal Reserve notes are protected by 40 percent of gold certificates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I will preface these remarks by quoting George Washington on the subject of public credit. He said, in part:

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible. * * *

The Roosevelt administration disregarding this wise admonition has done, and is now doing, everything within its power to appropriate and to utilize the savings of those who have been thrifty and frugal to finance the colossal spending program of the Government.

Under title II, section 205, of the banking bill before us, the administration is given full power to compel the banks to absorb Government printing-press bonds to meet the ever-mounting deficit of the new deal's spending program. There is the further power under the provisions of the bill to enable the administration to coerce the banks to issue notes to the full amount of whatever debts the new deal may create.

Before I venture to speak in defense of the rights of some 25,000,000 persons, who have been the backbone of this Nation in every crisis, I shall cite an authority to justify a Representative in Congress in offering constructive criticism with reference to the pending legislation. Woodrow Wilson in his work on constitutional government has this to say:

It is plain that parliaments, that representative bodies free to criticize not only but acting with independence, uttering the voice of those who are governed and enjoying such authority as no king or president or officer of any kind may gainsay, constitute an indispensable part of the institutional make-up of a constitutional government.

A voice in behalf of the industrious, temperate, thrifty citizens who have sacrificed, saved, and invested their money as a protection against sickness and old age is seldom raised on the floor of this House. It was to this class of citizens to whom the Government appealed to buy liberty bonds to finance the World War.

The Government urged these good, substantial, enterprising citizens, millions of whom were wage earners and tillers of the soil, to buy bonds until it hurt. They did so. Under the new deal the resources of this group have been raided and the Government's promises to them repudiated.

The revolutionary, socialistic regime now formulating and directing the fiscal affairs of the United States Government asks for power under title II of this bill to set up a financial guillotine to decapitate the middle-class capitalists. This proscribed class comprises the thrifty and frugal men and women who have toiled and sacrificed and saved that they might invest in United States bonds, in life insurance, in small annuities, in farm mortgages, with the hope of a return on their investments to partially protect them from want during their old age.

Now, it is proposed to raid the resources of these thrifty individuals by a resort to printing-press bonds, a scheme more subtle and less alarming but just as devastating in its results as to attempt to achieve the same result by means of printing-press money.

It is a piece of trickery and fraud upon the public that is reprehensible and indefensible on the part of a responsible Government.

Let me be more specific as to what this legislation portends. The purpose under this bill is to create a politically controlled, manipulated, and dominated central bank, to provide for unlimited credit inflation. Is there necessity for it? Every member of this House knows that credit has been expanding and is now expanding more rapidly than business. The Federal Reserve reports tell the story. Bank deposits are now increasing at an alarming rate. I say alarming advisedly, for every Member here knows that this increase comes from the Budget deficit financing of this administration. We all know that the larger our Government deficit, the greater will be the possible credit expansion.

The speculative dikes under this ever-increasing pressure must eventually break; then the deluge! When this happens, as it surely will, the purchasing value of the dollar will begin to diminish and it will continue to do so until it strips the very hide off the wage earner, the depositor, the bondholder, the annuitant, the pensioner, those with a fixed salary.

Why ignore the mistakes of the past, both in this country and in foreign countries, where, time and again, inflation has produced poverty among the toiling masses? There are 25,000,000 forgotten men and women who are to be plundered under the provisions of this bill unless there is an immediate return to legislative sanity. Of this number, there are 13,000,000 frugal and thrifty people who have earned and saved and deposited in mutual-savings banks approximately $10,000,000,000.

Two and one-third millions of men and women have earned and saved enough to enable them to deposit in our postal savings banks $1,200,000,000.

Ten million wage earners have become members of building-and-loan associations.

The purchasing power of the accumulated savings of this group of middle class citizens will be sacrificed under the inflationary powers which it is proposed to give to a crew of political spenders. The citizens who have labored long hours to earn and save enough to pay for a home, educate their children, support the social and civic activities in the community in which they live do not count with the socialistic "new dealers." This class of dependable citizens has not been found useful to the political-minded members of this administration, because they are a type that refuses to be herded at the polls and voted in mass.

The American people, especially the energetic, thrifty, and law abiding are being ground down and crushed between two powerful forces, those who are planning a system of State socialism, and those who plan to exploit the taxpayers for political plunder and control. An eminent psychologist who has studied the revolutionary movements of the Socialists throughout the world has classified the men and women who invariably assume active leadership in the destruction of constitutional government. He enumerates them as—

Social failures, misunderstood geniuses, lawyers without clients, writers without readers, doctors without patients, professors ill-paid, graduates without employment, clerks whose employers disdain them for their insufficiency, puffed-up university instructors—these are the natural adepts of socialism.

It is to individuals of this character to whom the administration has surrendered some of the more important functions of government. Step by step, under the leadership of this heterodox conglomerate group the credit of the United States has steadily declined. I say heterodox because heretofore the opinions of such men as Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln, and many other great statesmen of the past, have not been without weight.

Do the provisions of this inflationary measure, the provisions of which authorize a program of unlimited spending, harmonize with the advice given by Washington in his farewell address? The new-deal plunderers will not listen, but is it not time for the representatives of the people to give heed? Here is what Washington said:

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible; avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, by remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate.

[Applause.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it was this particular section of the bill that I had reference to the other day when I called attention to the fact that the power is given the Federal Reserve Board to force the Federal Reserve banks to take unlimited issues of Government obligations against their will. That might not seem on the face of it to be too serious a situation, except that later on we provide that this same Board determines the monetary policy of the Government. Formerly there were eight different kinds of money. There were gold coin and gold certificates and silver coin and silver certificates and United States bank notes, known as "greenbacks", Federal Reserve bank notes and Federal Reserve notes and national bank notes, but under present policies we are going to have only three different kinds of currency. We are going to have subsidiary coin, the kind that you carry in your pocket, and we are going to have silver certificates, and we are going to have Federal Reserve notes. The Treasury the other day deflated the currency by $600,000,000 by calling in the consols and the Panamas. So it is going to be necessary if they bring the total amount of money outstanding up to $5,600,000,000, where it was when they started, to issue $600,000,000 of Federal Reserve notes. That brings us to the question which has been raised so often on the floor—whether it is advisable to issue currency of the United States by private banks with interest-bearing Government bonds securing those issues. I cannot see for the life of me where anybody gets very much satisfaction in this bill which centralizes control under a private institution and turns over to that private institution the prerogatives and authority of Congress under the Constitution to coin money and regulate the value of it. The thing that we have done in that direction apparently, if this bill is passed, is to substitute about $600,000,000 of 2-percent consols and Panamas for 2½- to 3½-percent interest-bearing bonds, which brings me to the thing I wanted to call attention to this afternoon. We not only turn the currency-creating power over to a private institution, but we also make that private institution the fiscal agent of the United States, to sell its bonds, so that the currency and the national debt are brought into such close relationship that as the national debt goes up or comes down, there will be a like fluctuation in the value of our money. That is not conducive to stability, that is not conducive to confidence.

I do not like to get into personalities, but I call attention to a statement made before the committee by the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board with respect to the national debt. He said he was not afraid of a forty-billion debt. In our committee 2 years ago a Senator appearing before the committee was asked the question, "How far can we go in issuing bonds before the credit of the United States will be seriously affected." He said he could not speak for himself, but that the financial advisers of his committee in the Senate had told him that we could go up to about $35,000,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Two years ago we could go up to $35,000,000,000 without seriously impairing the credit of the United States. The whole situation has changed. As we approach $35,000,000,000 everybody considers that his property is worth ever so much more than it was before, just as the church property in France went up 500,000,000 assignats over night, preceeding the inflation in France, and so the wealth of the Nation has gone up during this last year to the extent that the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board says that $40,000,000,000 will not seriously affect our credit.

Mr. Chairman, those are the successive steps which have always been taken by every country which has experienced pernicious inflation, and that is where we are headed. This bill will bring the money-creating power into close affiliation with the national debt under a head which seriously believes that $40,000,000,000 of national obligations is not a serious question. In view of the fact that we may have a national debt of $40,000,000,000 and that there is another $16,000,000,000 of internal municipal debt, which makes a total debt of about $56,000,000,000, is it not foolish to assume that the credit of the United States might not be seriously affected? Then, if in the judgment of this Board it is found necessary to adopt another suggestion whereby, behind all the deposits in our banks which will aggregate possibly forty billion, there should be 100 percent of reserves either in Government bonds or currency, we will print a potential twenty billions of currency. These billions must be in the form of Federal Reserve notes and will be secured by the interest-bearing bonds of the Government.

I think, before we vote for this bill and give this power to any politicalized body, we should recognize just where we are going. If you know where you are going, then of course the responsibility is yours, because on the Republican side, we believe in sound currency and in sound credit for the Government, and we, frankly and politically, just expect you to go along as you always have, tinkering with the currency, destroying credit, and destroying the only thing upon which we can build prosperity. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] has expired.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, when the committee goes back into the House, I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] will offer a motion to recommit the bill, and I presume he will move the previous question on his motion. If the previous question carries, the only thing we can vote upon will be the motion to recommit offered by Mr. HOLLISTER. If the previous question does not carry, I will offer an amendment to the motion to recommit, which will read as follows:

Amendment to the motion to recommit offered by Mr. HOLLISTER offered by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH: Strike out all the language of the motion to recommit and insert the following:

On page 51, strike out everything from lines 4 to 10, inclusive, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"(c) It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the average purchasing power of the dollar as ascertained by the Department of Labor in the wholesale commodity markets for the period covering the years 1921 to 1929, inclusive, shall be promptly restored; and that after such restoration shall have been achieved, the purchasing power of the dollar shall be maintained substantially stable in relation to a suitable index of basic commodity prices which the Federal Reserve Board shall cause to be compiled and published in complete detail at weekly intervals.

"The Federal Reserve Board, the Federal Reserve banks, and the Secretary of the Treasury are hereby charged with the duty of making effective this policy. To this end it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to establish or cause to be established in the United States a free and open market in which gold and silver may be bought and sold for use, investment, or trade, and to determine, without limitations, and with the advice of the Federal Reserve Board, the amounts and the prices at which the Treasury shall buy and sell gold and silver; and report the bill back immediately as so amended."

This is the amendment I offered this afternoon and which failed to carry by a vote of 128 to 122.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I cannot add much to what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] has said with reference to striking out the section relating to open-market operations. I would like to take the time to read what a former Member of this House, Mr. Lewis W. Douglas, has said recently, if I felt that it would at all bring us to our senses. I would like to read again what I put into the RECORD last week, when I stated that the sponsors must believe that the necessities brought about by the $4,800,000,000 appropriation require the passage of this legislation at this session.

Now, the hidden thing in all of this is the need of passing it, although the advocates of this legislation publicly say it is not necessary right now. If it is not necessary, why pass this title II and frighten the people and the banks more and more? If the necessities of the hour do demand it, I might vote with you, as I voted with you on the Goldsborough amendment a year or two ago, when the credit of our Government needed that particular type of assistance; but you deny that it is necessary to pass this at this moment. Your hidden belief, I think, is, in fact, that you think it is necessary and you are trying to put it through under the cover of title I and title III. Let us come out in the open and confess the real reason for this insistence that it be enacted at this session.

Many of the banks today do not dare acknowledge that they cannot pay dividends on the preferred stock now owned by the R. F. C. The banks are helpless in daring to suggest their opposition. They do not wish to acknowledge to their depositors that 44 percent of their assets, their money, is invested in United States securities. The Government is taking your money, just as surely and as swiftly as they took it by the gold seizure, only it is doing it by another method. In addition, there are $18,000,000,000 of community and municipal debts that are held largely by the banks. How much more can our banks absorb and still keep in sound condition? If United States bonds do go down again to 80, their very capital assets would be in grave danger.

Mr. MCFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. No. I only have a minute more. Is it any comfort to them to be told, "Bring in your bonds and we will print United States notes and give you in exchange for them; you can always get notes for your bonds under title II"? But the indebtedness of the Government still goes merrily on and up! If you pass the rest of title II, you can bring in any sound asset, together with the bonds already taken, so they can be forced to reloan to the Government. It is as though they loaned me $100,000 and took my note.

Then I wanted another $100,000. They would take my note and discount it and give me another $100,000. I want still another $100,000, and they again take my note and discount it a third or fourth time, no matter whether I have expectation of making repayment or not. That is the position you are placing your Government in. No matter how much your Government owes, bring in the bond and we will give you new money to reloan the Government and you will have to do it—as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] pointed out—whether you like to do it or not.

I again urge you to read what Lewis W. Douglas has repeatedly stated during the past few months relative to this grave danger of Government spending. You will not believe me. Maybe you will believe him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOLLISTER) there were—ayes 51, noes 63.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. HOLLISTER and Mr. STEAGALL as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 53, noes 83.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point an amendment which I will propose tomorrow and ask unanimous consent to have considered.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman does not ask consent to have it considered now?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Amendment by Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina: On page 43, after the colon in line 13, insert the following new paragraph:

"(1) No State nonmember bank, other than (a) a mutual savings bank or (b) a Morris plan bank or (c) a bank located in the Territories of Hawaii or Alaska, shall become or continue an insured bank after July 1, 1938, and the insured status and insurance of the deposits of each State nonmember bank, other than (a) a mutual savings bank or (b) a Morris plan bank or (c) a bank located in the Territories of Hawaii or Alaska, shall terminate on July 1, 1938."

Amend further by striking out the figure "(1)" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "(2)."

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 206. Section 13 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph reading as follows:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, upon the endorsement of any member bank, which shall be deemed a waiver of demand, notice and protest as to its own endorsement exclusively, and subject to such regulations as to maturities and other matters as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, any Federal Reserve bank may discount any commercial, agricultural, or industrial paper and may make advances to any such member bank on its promissory notes secured by any sound assets of such member bank."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODRUM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 7617, the Banking Act of 1935, had come to no resolution thereon.

WHITE HOUSE PRESS CONFERENCES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 8, 1935.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I wish very much that you would thank the House of Representatives, and Congressman JOHN MARTIN of Colorado in particular, for the opportunity given me in House Resolution 212 to transmit the transcript of my conference with the press wherein I spoke of the historic attitude of certain types of business organizations toward legislative proposals which have been introduced in the Congress of the United States and in many State legislatures during the last 20 years or more. I do appreciate this opportunity.

I do not believe, however, that it would be advisable for me to create the precedent of sending to the Congress for documentary use the text of remarks I make at the bi-weekly conferences with the newspaper representatives here in Washington.

It is my desire that these conferences should be continued on the free and open basis which I have endeavored to maintain at all times. To create the precedent of permitting questions and answers which come up at a press conference to be transcribed and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or other official documents would mean that I no longer would feel like speaking extemporaneously and informally, as is my habit, and it would bring to me a consciousness of restraint as well as a necessity for constant preparation of my remarks. The simple truth is that I do not have the time to give to such preparation for a press conference.

I much prefer to continue the conferences in the free and informal fashion. The newspapermen, except where particular permission is given, do not directly quote the statements I make to them. They do, however, use them in substance, and the press reports generally published following the conference of Friday, May 3 last, present an accurate record of the statements I made at that time. As a matter of fact, there would be little difference between the transcript of this conference and the published reports except that one would be in the nature of a direct quotation and the other would be indirect.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

HON. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,

Speaker of the House of Representatives,

Washington, D. C.

HOW P. W. A. HANDLES LOANS AND GRANTS FOR MUNICIPAL PROJECTS

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein certain letters and excerpts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, a careful reading and analysis of several scores of letters received from municipal officials and others interested in applications made to the P. W. A. for loans and grants to assist in establishing or extending municipal projects of various kinds reveals the following interesting and significant facts:

I. OBSTACLES ENCOUNTERED

As shown in the complete report on the applications for grants and loans which was read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 29, 1935, under the caption, "Power Plant Projects, the P. W. A. and the Power Trust", pages 6155-6162, very few of the municipalities applying for Federal loans and grants have received any money. However, it must be noted, and the letters received indicate that in many cases the failure of these loans and grants is due to no fault of the P. W. A., but to other matters over which it has no control. It should also be noted that the records show:

First. That in a few cases at least municipalities have received the grants and completed their plants or extensions, as, for example, an extension at Fort Morgan, Colo.; a complete plant at Columbia, Mo.; another at Pawnee, Okla.; one at Culpeper, Va.; and a plant nearing completion at Chambersburg, Pa.

Second. The record also shows that in several cases the cities' financial conditions were such that they could not give adequate security; and, again,

Third. In many cases the State laws made the proposed loans and grants impossible, and in this case much credit is due the P. W. A. for an outstanding service rendered in this connection. The Legal Department of the P. W. A. prepared proposed copies of needed enabling legislation, which was forwarded to the State officials to assist them in amending, repealing, or adding to their statutes so as to facilitate the municipal projects; and, finally, it should be noted that—

Fourth. In many cases where projects were under way the opposing private utility companies have interjected court actions of various kinds, and thus tied up the procedure. It would seem that this method of opposition on the part of the private utilities is practically universal and persistent.

II. THE GENERAL SITUATION

With the above matters in mind, it still remains a fact that, speaking generally, very few municipalities that have applied for loans and grants have received any money. At most, it would seem only five or six have been successful, and they are in comparatively small places, or comparatively unimportant extensions and improvements. Outside of allotments for municipal water works and one or two non-Federal district power systems, the municipalities have received very little assistance, so little, indeed, as to be insignificant. As shown in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 29, above referred to—

Out of several hundred applications filed, totaling more than $612,935,380, only $3,292,100—not taking into consideration $20,482,000 allotted for water power—had thus far been completed or under construction.

The details of the report submitted by the Federal Works Administration are given in the report above referred to.

Owen C. Donley, city attorney of Elk Point, S. Dak., writing on this point says:

It will be of interest to you to know that in the States of Montana, North Dakota, and South Dakota the Electric Power Board of Review, to March 19, 1935, has allotted the aggregate amount of $600,000 for non-Federal electric-power projects; that in these States the following number of applications were made for grants for non-Federal electric-power projects, namely, North Dakota, 8; Montana, 3; South Dakota, 3.

It is further significant and somewhat surprising to find that in some of the cases where the municipalities have actually received their money and built their plants there has been serious complaint and dissatisfaction, as will be shown below. In other cases where allotments have been made and the works have been completed, it is surprising to find that the money which the P. W. A. has agreed to pay and has obligated itself to do so, has up to date not been received by the municipalities, which has compelled them to advance the money in whatever ways they can from their own sources, awaiting the delayed action on the part of the P. W. A. This will be explained below.

III. SOME TYPICAL CASES

Before giving the details of the letters submitted I present below some typical instances of the way the applications for municipal loans and grants for light and power projects have been handled.

First. Seattle, Wash.: A letter from J. D. Ross, superintendent of the department of lighting of the city of Seattle, dated May 3, 1935, reads in part, as follows:

We were the first municipality in the United States to present our application to the P. W. A. for funds wherewith we might complete our Diablo plant, construct our office building in Seattle, build a transmission line and a large substation, clear the Ruby Basin on the Skagit River, and construct the Ruby Dam. In this application I offered to put to work 3,600 men for 3 years, * * * using a greater proportion of labor to material than prevails in the large bulk structures that are now being built by the Federal Government. Practically all of the material would have been manufactured within this area also, so that the recurring benefit of every dollar expended would have been more wide-spread in this area than any other dollar expenditure that I know of, here or elsewhere.

While I pursued this quest for funds very diligently for a year and a half, I was given an answer of neither "yes" nor "no", although it did come to my knowledge that the request would not be granted because the city of Seattle was in competition with a private power company.

I was told that Washington's allotment of funds had already been placed. This was done on the Grand Coulee project, where, during the early months of its construction, it was announced that residents from outside of the immediate area of the dam would not be eligible for work until those close by had been placed. This meant that for many months no one from Puget Sound area could obtain work on the Grand Coulee project. Even now, when the gates are open to them, it is such a distance away and such poor provisions are made for family housing that there are few who can break their family ties to go over there, even though it were economically feasible for them to do so on the small pay offered.

As evidence of the soundness of what we requested, I was able, over a year ago, to negotiate a $5,000,000 loan on Wall Street for doing the very things that the Federal Government would not assist us in doing because we were in competition with a private concern. The negotiation for this loan was carried on during the time and in the very face of the Federal Government's negative treatment of our application to them.

We are now rushing to completion our Diablo power house, and in a few months will have completed our office building. * * * The refusal from the Government was withheld through the year 1933 though it was the first of all in America. And the refusal was withheld through 1934, and so timed as to reach me on primary election day in November.

Second. Fort Collins, Colo.: Letters from Earl Douglass, commissioner of finance and ex-officio city treasurer of Fort Collins, and supplemental letters from the attorney for the city in this case indicate the following: The city of Fort Collins made its application for a loan and grant early in the period and at first secured an allotment. Later, however, the Public Service Co. offered vigorous and sustained opposition and launched several court actions against the city and the P. W. A. to prevent the loan and grant and finally succeeded in forcing an election on the subject. During this controversy—

The Public Service Co. of Colorado, being beaten in court, went to Washington and appeared before the Board of Review, stating that they were offering a cut in rates of 15 percent to Fort Collins, and so there was no use of the city building a plant. Mr. Hunt, without checking with the city's engineers as to whether the proposed cut was actually a 15-percent cut or not (it figures about 7.4 percent), and without a hearing from our side of the case, decided that our project was socially undesirable and wanted us to show why the project should not be dropped unless we could further reduce rates another 15 percent.

In the course of this controversy there appeared in the Express-Courier of Fort Collins a full one-third page ad with large display head:

United States Government states Fort Collins municipal plant "undesirable."

This claim on the part of the opponents of the municipal plant caused the city commissioners of the city of Fort Collins to publish an equally large display ad in the Monday, March 11, issue of the Express-Courier, in which they published in full the letter of Henry T. Hunt, chairman for the Administrator, in order to make clear to the people the position of the city commissioners and of the city in general on this particular matter. This letter of Mr. Hunt, as published in the Express-Courier, above mentioned, was dated November 9, 1934, and included, among other things, the following:

The Public Service Co. of Colorado has offered to put into effect the attached rate schedule, which is lower than that contemplated by the municipal system, and offers also to meet the expenses which the city has incurred in connection with the project. (Our italics.) We have concluded that unless the municipality agrees to put into effect rates at least 15 percent lower than those proposed by the company the project will lack social desirability (our italics) and will be inconsistent with the policy declared by the Administrator and approved by the President.

The ad of the city commissioners and city attorney then goes on to explain that—

The rates submitted to the P. W. A. in the statement by the city and referred to in Mr. Hunt's letter were the rates of the Public Service Co. in effect September 30, 1933, in Fort Collins, and not the proposed rates for the municipal light and power system. * * * The conference between Mr. Hunt and Messrs. Board and Bryans referred to in the above letter was without the knowledge of the city and for the sole purpose of interfering between the P. W. A. and the city so that the city would lose the $75,000 gift from the Government and could not sell its bonds at 4 percent. * * * The city council proceeded no further with Mr. Hunt, of the P. W. A. board of review, but took the matter up directly with Secretary Ickes, head of the entire P. W. A. * * * We did not feel justified at that time in carrying on negotiations with Mr. Hunt after he had held a secret conference with representatives of the Public Service Co. when the city had on April 10, 1934, signed a contract with the Government for a gift to the city of $75,000 and to purchase our 4-percent revenue bonds at par.

It is interesting to note that in his letter to the State engineer published in the ad, as mentioned above, Mr. Hunt points out, after insisting that the city must reduce its rates 15 percent to meet the competition of the private company, that—

The rates effected by the municipal plant must, of course, provide sufficient revenue to cover operating expenses and debt service with a reasonable margin of safety.

And he then adds a little later on:

It appears very doubtful whether with the reduced rates the loan will be reasonably secured on the basis of a 15-year loan period, and we are, therefore, prepared to consider the loan on a 20-year basis if the applicant so wishes.

Commissioner Earl Douglass, in his letter, further states:

Like so many of these P. W. A. cases, the Colorado Public Service Co. has served an injunction in the Federal court preventing Mr. Ickes from loaning us the money. So until the P. W. A. set-up is determined in the supreme court, I doubt whether anything can be done. Meanwhile, we are already financed by private capital.

A letter from Herbert A. Alpert, writing at the request of Prof. Earl Douglass, explains that in view of the cases bought by the private power company against the P. W. A. and the city—

The city considered it better to sell its bonds to private dealers. So on April 19 it completed a deal whereby its entire bond issue of 4½-percent revenue bonds were sold to Brown, Schlessman, Owen & Co., of Denver, Colo., for $96.81. * * * On April 20 the city deposited in court, in connection with the condemnation suit, the sum of $216,569.56 in full payment of the award of the jury, and the court thereupon entered a rule giving the city title to the distribution system. Immediately after this award was paid into court the Public Service Co. filed an application in the supreme court for a stay of all proceedings pending its decision in a taxpayers' suit previously brought to enjoin the city from constructing its project and which had been decided adversely to it in the lower court. * * * On April 23 the application of the company in the taxpayers' suit before the supreme court for temporary stay was denied by the supreme court in a 4 to 3 ruling. On April 25 the city commenced reading meters, and completed the reading of meters the following day, and at the same time notified all consumers that they were now purchasing their energy from the city. * * * The city has prevailed in all litigation to date, and although two of the cases are now pending in the supreme court and there is a possibility that the writ of certiorari if denied in the district court will also be appealed, the city officials do not feel that there will be any reversal in the supreme court.

Augusta, Ga.: A memorandum submitted by engineers for the Augusta Canal Commission and a supporting letter under date of March 14, 1935, is as follows:

The original application for P. W. A. funds for this project was made September 28, 1933. A loan and grant of $2,500,000 was asked for the construction of a hydroelectric plant and a Diesel engine plant to be located on the banks of the Augusta Canal near Raes Creek. * * * The vice president of the Georgia Power Co. claimed that the project was financially unsound and morally wrong in that it competed with the Georgia Power Co. * * * On the strength of these assertions, the board of review, without considering the city's situation in the matter, arbitrarily cut the loan and grant from $2,500,000 to $1,250,000 and ordered the city and the Georgia Power Co. to get together on an agreement to firm the power of the project. * * * When this amended application reached Washington, it was referred to the newly created Power Board of Review, headed by Mr. Henry Hunt, who soon after called a conference of the canal commission and officials of the Georgia Power Co. Mr. Hunt entirely ignored the suggestions of the Engineering Department of the P. W. A. on which the amended application had been based, and insisted that the Augusta Canal Commission must again open up negotiations with the Georgia Power Co. for stand-by power and for sale of dump power.

Writing to the Augusta Canal Commission, Mr. Henry T. Hunt, among other things, said:

Only the Georgia Power Co. is in a position to deliver necessary supplemental power. The officers of the company are reluctant, of course, to sell power to be utilized to compete with their company. The commission has proposed a power exchange agreement; * * * however, has not limited resale in such a manner as to protect the company's interest.

Mr. Hunt then suggests a basis upon which the negotiation between the company and the commission should proceed, and in this connection insists:

None of the commission's power, whether generated or purchased, shall be used to supply others than consumers who now have or may obtain, under existing conditions, the right to use canal water as a power source. (Italics mine.)

This Mr. Hunt designates as "an appropriate limitation of the commission's market." Further in Mr. Hunt's letter he insists that—

The period of the settlement should not be less than 20 years. (Italics mine.) * * * This Board is firmly of the opinion that the bonds of the commission issued * * * could not be serviced by its prospective revenues, as the load in the city of Augusta would be subject to competition from the Georgia Power Co., and furthermore that the Georgia Power Co. could and would make rates lower than those possible to the commission.

He then makes the point that since the commission is unwilling to negotiate on the basis suggested—

This Board has no other course before it than to recommend to the Administrator that the application be denied.

The report of the engineers, in reviewing the situation, says in conclusion:

The Augusta Canal Commission feels that it has always been placed in a disadvantageous position by the officials of the P. W. A. In the first place, the Board of Review forced the canal commission to negotiate with the Georgia Power Co. under a condition whereby it was impossible for the commission to carry out its project. * * * Again, before the Electric Power Board of Review in the latter part of 1934, the Augusta Canal Commission was placed in the same position of disadvantage in their negotiations with the Georgia Power Co.

The Augusta project is one of the oldest municipal power canals in the United States. It has been in successful operation for over 90 years. The plan for developing power on the canal has been under consideration for many years, and was blocked first by Harvey Couch, before the P. W. A. was established. The present negotiations have been going on now for a period of over 3½ years, and at present seem to be still in abeyance.

Fourth. Auburn, N. Y.: A letter from Kirk Bowen, mayor of Auburn, containing a copy of a letter addressed to Secretary Ickes, of the P. W. A., gives us the following information:

The original application made by the city of Auburn was for a municipal light and power plant to supply street lighting and other public purposes only. Later, however, after the enabling legislation passed by the State of New York made it possible for the city to legally proceed with a complete plant for supplying the entire city, a letter received by Mayor Bowen from Henry T. Hunt, chairman, and acting for the administrator, written under date of November 26, 1934, insisted that there should be added to the city's estimate—

$5,150 for fixed charges on existing equipment and $7,000 for loss of taxes paid by the company, a total of $71,260, as against a cost of $50,000 if the offer of the Empire Gas & Electric Co. is accepted. (Italics mine.)

The letter then goes on to say:

It is not the policy of this Administration to finance municipal electric systems which do not provide service at a lower cost than the cost of obtaining service from the utility company serving the city. It is suggested, therefore, that the city of Auburn accept the company's offer, thus enabling this Administration to utilize the allotment in situations providing the necessary social desirability.

In reply to this letter of Mr. Hunt, Mayor Bowen wrote direct to Secretary Ickes, in which he said:

After receipt of this communication the city took no further official steps to secure loan and grant, because on advice of your own engineers the project was economically unsound in view of the drastic reduction offered by the company. However, having been so successful in securing lower electric rates for municipal purposes, the city council decided to proceed under chapter 281 of the New York State Laws of 1934 and voted unanimously to investigate the feasibility of constructing a larger plant to serve all consumers of electricity within the city who desired such service. A careful engineering analysis indicates such a plant, on a self-liquidating basis, can reduce present exorbitant residential rates approximately 30 percent, and a bond election on this project has been called for April 18.

On February 28, after the date had been set for a referendum on the large plant and system, we received a loan and grant agreement executed by you on the original project, previously declared economically unsound by the Electric Power Board of Review. Opponents of municipal ownership now advocate original plan and are using this Federal approval of small plant as their prime argument against referendum on large plant. We would welcome Federal investigation of this situation, as entirely against your knowledge, your department is being used to further the selfish interests of the private utility company.

The matter went to referendum vote and was defeated, with the opposition using the argument supplied by the P. W. A. as indicated above.

IV. TYPICAL LETTERS AND FEATURES

First. Competitive plants are not favored by the P. W. A.: As indicated by some of the typical letters received and quoted above, there seems to have been a pretty well-settled policy on the part of the P. W. A. not to grant, or at least not to favor municipal projects where they were in competition with existing private plants. For example, T. E. Thompson, city manager of Shawnee, Okla., writes:

Two objections are made to our project. One is that they claim our percentage of bonded indebtedness is too high, and, secondly, that we would run in competition with the Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co.

Again, in the case of Fort Worth, Tex., Jerome C. Martin, city councilman, writes, under date of May 4, 1935, that their project was disproved—

Because the plant was not of sufficient capacity to furnish everyone in the city with electric power, and, furthermore, because it was a competitive system. (Italics mine.)

Further, in a letter by A. M. Ferebee, written for the Administrator, under date of February 27, 1935, the statement is made that the application was rejected, for—

It is further noted that the project would be competitive—

And so forth.

Similarly, in the case of Augusta, as above stated, objection was raised on the part of the P. W. A. because the project there would be "subject to competition from the Georgia Power Co.," and so forth.

Second. Companies given opportunity to underbid municipal plants, in which case grants were withheld: The way this operates has been mentioned above in connection with the Fort Collins, Colo., case. Also, in the case of Auburn, N. Y., we have referred to the statement by Henry T. Hunt, for the Administrator, to Mayor Kirk Bowen, in which it is stated:

It is not the policy of this Administration to finance municipal electric systems which do not provide service at a lower cost than the cost of obtaining service from the utility company serving the city.

Third. Those receiving grants dissatisfied: The correspondence received indicates that even in the case of at least some of the cities that have actually received grants there has been considerable dissatisfaction because of the way matters have been handled. This is particularly true in the case of Culpeper, Va. Mr. V. Von Gemmingen, town manager, writes:

Our application was one of the first filed in the State. About September 15, 1933, this project was reported favorably to the P. W. A. in Washington. Our first trouble seemed to be there, and it hung there indefinitely. It necessitated my making several trips each week to Washington to try to dislodge this jam. Finally, on November 10, 1933, our application was approved, and on December 20, 1933, a lapse of 40 days, the bond contract was signed. The town of Culpeper had drawn its plans and specifications, which were approved by the P. W. A., and duly advertised same. After making a study of the different Diesel engines, the town decided that they wished to install the V-G Moden De La Vergne engine; the bid on this was not the lowest, and for this reason the P. W. A. in Richmond refused to allow us to buy this engine. * * * After making repeated trips to Washington, the officials there notified the P. W. A. in Richmond that if we wished to buy the De La Vergne engines we could do so. Later we received a letter from the P. W. A. in Richmond apprising us of the fact that we could buy the De La Vergne engines, but sent a representative to Culpeper to appear before the council and to try to persuade the council to buy a cheaper make of engine.

Mr. Von Gemmingen further complains about the way the inspection was handled. He writes:

When construction was started a Federal inspector was sent to Culpeper who proved that he was not capable of handling the work in accordance with rules and regulations of the P. W. A.

The complaint here is that the inspector did not advise the city that the final grant could not be made until certain compliance certificates had been filed from the vendors of machinery, tools, and equipment, and so forth; that as a result a great deal of extra work and expense was incurred in assembling this information after the contractors had finished their work and left town. He also complains that the payments on the allotments were not made. He says:

This work was begun the winter of 1934, and on May 2, 1935, we have yet to receive final payment from Washington. (Italics mine.) * * * In our plant the unwarranted delay caused by the P. W. A. cost the town of Culpeper a financial loss in excess of $27,000 gross revenue, to say nothing of this extra cost added to the bids by the contractors, the immense amount of office work, and red tape incurred by restrictions and rules of the P. W. A. * * *

As you are aware, such projects are duly advertised and let to contractors. The contractors have completed their work and these contractors, under our approved contract, were due final payment 4 months ago. On account of not securing the final grant as set forth in our bond contract, we are unable to settle with these contractors and it has worked a hardship on the contractors having to wait for such a long period for settlement. We are today advertising for bids for the construction of a sewerage-disposal plant. However, after our experience with P. W. A. projects we have found it unwise to consider this work under the P. W. A. and will have to build same under regular contract. * * *

I think that you can plainly see from the predicament that the town of Culpeper was left in that we are justified in our decision to fight shy of any and all propositions presented to us by any agent of the Federal Government. * * * Taking all matters into consideration—innumerable delays, red tape, and additional office work have been a source of great expense and trouble—the 30-percent grant as allowed by the P. W. A. on such projects does not compensate the town or any political subdivision to enter into any agreement with the P. W. A.

Fourth. Costly delays: The correspondents complain in many cases of long and costly delays. We have above cited the case of Culpeper. T. E. Thompson, city manager of Shawnee, Okla., writes that—Application filed 18 months ago was held up in the Oklahoma City office of the P. W. A. some 8 or 10 months and finally sent to Washington.

In the case of New London, Mo., Mr. J. R. Leavy, secretary of the Municipal Light League, complains that the delays in their case were so long that the matter—

Was stopped due to the fact that the Federal Government ceased accepting applications before any deal was consummated regarding their plans.

Frank E. Trobaugh, of West Frankfort, Ill., speaking of their case, says:

The application is dragging in the Department at Washington. It has been there for over a year and is still pending.

D. S. Johnson, of De Ridder, La., says:

Our application was filed with the New Orleans office about 15 months ago. It remained in that office until the authorities at Washington demanded that it be forwarded to them. Mr. J. M. Formey, of Hammond, La., our engineer, spent 5 weeks in Washington looking after our application. (Italics mine.)

Ray Garver, superintendent, of Hiram, Ohio, writes:

There has been a heartbreaking amount of red tape and inertia to overcome all along.

Fifth. Cities advised to submit to company terms and renew franchise grants: We have referred above to the case of Auburn, N. Y., where, in a letter addressed to the mayor, Kirk Bowen, Henry T. Hunt, writing for the Administrator, says:

It is suggested, therefore, that the city of Auburn accept the company's offer, thus enabling this administration to utilize the allotment in situations providing the necessary social desirability.

In the case of Fort Worth, Tex., Jerome C. Martin, city councilman, writes:

We feel that the information that we have received from the P. W. A. is perfectly ridiculous and reminds us of the difficulty that we experienced here in Fort Worth with the local P. W. A. officials when they did everything in their power to discourage the filing of the application by informing us that the chances were very remote that the loan would ever be made and that the thing for us to do was to buy the existing company at a valuation of $17,000,000 when the taxable value of it is only $5,000,000.

We have already cited the case of Augusta, where the P. W. A. officials insisted that the canal commission should negotiate with the private power company upon their terms and enter into an agreement to limit their market to existing customers and to extend the agreement for a period not less than 20 years. (See above.)

In the case of Fort Worth, Tex., City Councilman Martin writes that the State P. W. A. officials urged the applicants—

That the thing to do was to buy the existing company at their valuation.

Sixth. Misstatements: In some cases rather surprising misstatements were made in the reports to the cities. In the case of Circleville, W. Va., we are told by Mr. Harry C. Wolfe, engineer, that—

To clear legal difficulties we managed to have the State legislature pass a special act specifically authorizing the town of Circleville to issue revenue bonds for the project. And yet the P. W. A. takes final action on April 23, 1935, by saying that their legal division is of the opinion that the town would have no authority to issue revenue bonds, and that, therefore, the application has been finally disapproved.

In reply to this Mr. Wolfe wrote to Mr. Philip B. Fleming, acting deputy administrator, calling his attention to the special act passed by the legislature, a copy of which was made a part of their application. Mr. Wolfe says:

With a copy of this act before it, is it not a little bit ridiculous for your legal division to form the opinion that the town of Circleville would have "no authority" to issue revenue bonds?

In the case of Mount Dora, Fla., William J. Johnson, treasurer, writes that they were told that—

Our financial condition was in such shape that they could not consider a loan. In order for one to arrive at such a conclusion they must have read the figures upside down. We know of no other community of like size that is in better financial condition.

Seventh. Indefinite answers: Complaint is made by several municipalities that they could never get a definite answer, either yes or no, from the P. W. A. authorities. In the case of Seattle, for example, J. D. Ross complains:

For a year and a half I was given an answer of neither yes nor no.

In the case of Fort Worth a letter to the city manager by Mr. A. M. Ferebee, for the Administrator, states:

No final settlement has been made with regard to this application.

Thus indicating that further consideration might be given.

Eighth. Indefiniteness of policy: Mr. William J. Johnson, treasurer of Mount Dora, Fla., writes:

The Electrical Board of Review have concluded that our application was "without social desirability." We are puzzled to know just what this means.

The expression "without social desirability" occurs often in the letters sent to the municipalities, and its meaning is never clearly defined.

Ninth. Onerous conditions exacted: Barzilla W. Clark, mayor of Idaho Falls, writes of certain complications caused by the Reclamation Department in connection with the use of the water resources of the North Fork of the Snake River from which the city hydro plant derives some of its power. He says:

The Government now offers the city of Idaho Falls a contract whereby we furnish the Utah Power & Light Co. 1,000 kilowatts during the 5 winter months when water is being stored, the contract to be perpetual, with no allowance for depreciation, replacements, or other recompense. In other words, the city of Idaho Falls is to spend $110,000, besides the Government's $50,000, to install this 1,000 kilowatts, to be delivered to the Utah Power & Light Co. as long as Snake River flows. The power company threatens lawsuits if we "invade" their territory. They flatly refuse to sign any contract, either with the Government or our city, unless the city signs a perpetual agreement that it would not sell power in the power company's territory.

The letter of Mayor Clark, addressed to Frank R. McNinch, Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, concludes:

Is your Commission going to let the Reclamation Department and the Power Trust put the "squeeze" on a small intermountain city which has prior filings on the waters of the North Fork of Snake River and which shows a highly successful record of municipal ownership?

Tenth. Rewriting and revisions of applications: Engineers, who do not wish their names mentioned for fear of compromising the chances of their clients receiving favorable consideration from the P. W. A., complain that they have been required to do enormous amounts of unnecessary work to meet the terrific requirements of the legal and other divisions of the P. W. A. In one place it is stated that 80 documents, including ordinances, mortgages, transcripts, and what not, were prepared and submitted. Enough letters have been written to adequately cover a loan of $10,000,000 in one case where the total amount involved was only $32,500. Another engineer complains that they have been required to submit 22 different sets of plans and specifications for one project. These extra plans have cost them hundreds of dollars, the blue prints of each set alone costing $25.

Eleventh. Delayed payments: In some cases, after allotments have been made, contracts entered into, and the work done, the municipalities have not received the promised money, which has proven embarrassing. Willis J. Spaulding, commissioner of public property of Springfield, Ill., writes:

So far P. W. A. has advanced no money whatever on docket 759. We have supplied all the money from our own treasury and have been waiting for several months for a payment on the grant. We have found that to have work done under P. W. A. has resulted in a substantial increase in the cost; so that if we do not receive our 30-percent grant, it will mean positive loss to the city.

We have already cited the case of Culpeper, where the money has been allotted and the plant built, and yet the manager complains that they are unable to discharge their obligations and pay their contractors because the P. W. A. has not met its obligations or made its promised payments.

Twelfth. Announced policy not always followed: As noted, the announced policy of the P. W. A. has been not to favor municipal grants where municipal plants would be competitive. And yet, in the case of Circleville, W. Va., we are told that the project—

Is a noncompetitive self-liquidating project. * * * Circleville is a small, isolated community and at present is without electric service. There is but very little possibility that existing transmission lines will be extended to serve the community.

In this case the application is refused on other grounds, namely, that State laws do not permit the project, whereas the engineers claim that the State legislature had passed a special act authorizing the project.

Thirteenth. Municipalities compelled to resort to private borrowing: As a result of the various difficulties and delays explained herewith, many cities have grown discouraged, given up securing funds through the P. W. A., and built their own extensions or plants with private loans. We have already cited the case of Seattle, which, after a year and a half of delay, had no difficulty in securing a loan of $5,000,000 from private sources. Similarly, Fort Collins, Colo., finally gave up trying to get the funds through the P. W. A. and has very promptly disposed of its securities through a private financing concern.

H. E. Allen, superintendent of the municipal light plant of Wyandotte, Mich., writes:

In November 1932, the department of municipal services made application to the R. F. C. for a loan of $150,000 to complete a new power plant, which was at that time partially uncompleted. The loan was refused on account of legal technicalities, and the request was later withdrawn. However, we were able to finish the project, paying for the same from current earnings, and our power plant has been operating about 14 months. (P. W. A. reports "under study.")

W. H. Green, mayor of Muscle Shoals, Ala., writes:

Several months ago we began to build a power system for our municipality, borrowing the money from citizens of our town. We made application to the P. W. A. to expand our electrical system, but it was rejected because a water project was attached. We have been informed that the application has been acted upon by the various departments. We are getting our power from the T. V. A. and retelling it. Since making the first application we have borrowed more money from our citizens and have expanded the system, but it is far from being sufficient to care for the needs of the town. (Italics mine.)

W. W. Cullman, superintendent at Morgan City, La., writes:

Because of the pressure the Power Trust used, the city was very carefully turned down on its application for the loan. * * * Regardless of the action taken by the R. F. C. and the influence of Harvey Couch, we built the plant, and it is in operation, although it cost the city about $22,000 more to finance the project than if we could have borrowed the money from the R. F. C. (P. W. A. reports "under study.")

H. C. Zenor, of Brooklyn, Ind., writes that their project was stopped because the State had no law providing for revenue bonds. He says:

It will be necessary for the town to bring suit before the Supreme Court to clarify the law, and, of course, this would involve considerable expense. * * * We have tried to finance the project by using revenue bonds, which were sold locally without difficulty, and we have the plant completed at a cost a little less than half of what it would have cost in the P. W. A. way. (Italics mine.)

Fourteenth. Power Trust influence asserted: In several of the letters mentioned above it has been boldly asserted by city officials that they felt sure that the influence of the power interests had been effective in blocking their applications. W. W. Cullman, of Morgan City, La., writes:

Because of the pressure the Power Trust used, the city was very carefully turned down on their application for the loan. We could hardly expect any other decision in view of the fact that Mr. Harvey Couch is one of the three members of the R. F. C. and a hundred percent Power Trust believer, because he is a very heavy stockholder in several public utilities.

In the case of St. Cloud, Minn., a letter signed by the president, vice president, and three other members of the city council, written to the Federal Emergency Administration under date of October 11, 1934, in which, in discussing the activities of the private power interests in defeating their campaign for a municipal light plant, which they had hoped to secure through the P. W. A. loan, they say:

The Northern States Power Co. apparently did not save effort or expense in defeating the proposed amendment. * * * The only local daily newspaper, a Democratic organ, owned and published by Mr. Fred Schilplin, a former vice chairman of the Minnesota State Board of Public Works Administration, and now State director of the Federal Housing Administration, through its editorial column viciously attacked the amendment by misleading, inaccurate, and ambiguous statements. * * * Mr. Schilplin, according to newspaper reports, appointed R. F. Pack, president of the Northern States Power Co., on the Minneapolis Federal Housing Committee. In these respects and in many others, through high-powered campaign methods, the city council believes the people were misinformed and frightened, and as a result thereof the proposed amendment was voted down.

Fifteenth. Delaying reemployment: The failure, for whatever reasons, to make the grants and loans to the municipalities results in a delay of reemployment. In other words, were the projects applied for given the required funds, they would to that extent give employment to labor. For example, in the case of Seattle the project, if it had received the funds applied for, would have employed 3,600 men for 3 years. Similarly, every other delayed project meant the delay to that extent of the reemployment of those out of work.

Sixteenth. Concentrating upon State and Federal projects at the expense of local and municipal: In a study of the letters received from the various cities it appears that there is a tendency, whether conscious or not, to concentrate efforts and investments upon the large Federal projects and to withhold allotments from the local or municipal projects. This is illustrated in the letter of Secretary Ickes to me in connection with the Wichita Falls, Tex., proposed municipal plants. Secretary Ickes here suggests that the engineers of the Department advise that power could be supplied to Wichita from the proposed hydroelectric development on the Colorado River. However, this particular development is some 200 miles away from Wichita Falls, and it is believed that there will hardly be sufficient current produced at the proposed hydro development to supply the market in the cities and communities within 100 miles, the point being that here is illustrated the tendency which has been noted elsewhere to favor the development of large State or Federal projects and to discourage the local or municipal projects.

The same tendency is very strikingly illustrated in the case of the application of Seattle, which, as related above by Supt. J. D. Ross, was sacrificed in the interest of the great Federal project at Grand Coulee.

BANKING ACT OF 1935

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio speech I made Monday evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by myself, ranking member of the House Banking and Currency Committee, on the pending banking bill, over the facilities of the National Broadcasting System, red network, from station WRC, May 6, 1935, 6 to 6:15 p. m.

In the few minutes which have been allotted to me tonight I am going to speak on the subject of the so-called "Banking Act of 1935", which is now under discussion in the House of Representatives and under consideration in the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate. So much has been claimed for this bill; so much that is misleading has appeared in the press and has been broadcast through the air, that it is right and proper that there should be made a clear and simple statement of the fundamental issue which this bill raises, that is, an unwise increase in centralization of authority in the hands of a politically controlled board, over the banking system of the country.

The bill itself is divided into three parts, or titles, the first of which deals with certain changes in the law governing the insurance of bank deposits. The third contains a number of minor changes in the general banking laws. Both these titles are in the main satisfactory, but cleverly sandwiched in between them is title II, containing provisions which, if they become law, effect most dangerous changes in the Federal Reserve Act, that broad statute under which the far-flung Federal Reserve Banking System of the country operates.

We have become so used to the smooth and efficient working of the Federal Reserve System that we are prone to forget what a great reform it effected in our banking set-up, and what a long and careful study preceded its adoption. Leading bankers, economists who had specialized in the study of banking methods, industrial leaders, and members of the appropriate committees of both Houses of Congress, worked for several years on the preliminaries of the plan and made a careful study of the central banks of foreign countries, with a view toward evolving a system which would best fit the peculiar conditions of this country. It was agreed that the condition that then existed was unsatisfactory, and that greater flexibility of credit and concentration of reserves was desirable.

A bank cannot, of course, always have available liquid resources to meet the demands of all its depositors, for if this were so, it could not perform one of the chief functions of banking; that is, the lending of money to legitimate borrowers. Though it must keep a certain safe percentage of liquidity, the percentage which is safe in normal times may not be in times of stress, and there should therefore be certain reserves on which that bank can draw in times of emergency. Sometimes an emergency strikes a particular part of the country with great force, though other parts may be unaffected, and if a bank's reserves are carried in other banks of the locality, for the same reasons that cause the pressure on the first bank its reserves become unavailable at the very time when most needed. For this reason a national system of reserve banking is necessary, and in the operation of such a national system there must be a certain amount of coordination and unified policy.

With these fundamental principles before them, the builders of the Federal Reserve Act were faced with pressure on the one hand from those who believed in a central bank owned and operated by the Government, and on the other from those who wished that the central banking system have no connection whatsoever with the Government. The Federal Reserve Act as finally constituted was a happy compromise between these views. There was set up a Board known as the "Federal Reserve Board", consisting now of 8 members, 6 appointed for 12-year terms by the President, and, in addition, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency. Of the 6 appointed members the President names 1 as Governor and 1 as Vice Governor. The Governor has become in time the dominant figure in the conduct of the affairs of the bank.

The act further divided up the country into 12 Federal Reserve districts, each established to cover as well as possible an area which was reasonably compact from a business point of view. One Federal Reserve bank was established in each district, and all banks which cared to do so became members of the Federal Reserve System and took stock in the Federal Reserve bank of their district. These member banks elected two-thirds of the board of directors of their regional bank, while the other one-third was named by the Federal Reserve Board, thus giving the central board considerable voice in the activities of the regional bank, and yet leaving major control in the hands of the banks whose money had gone to supply the capital of these regional banks.

The chief functions of the Federal Reserve banks are, first, to hold the reserves of the member banks—that is, a certain percentage of their deposits established by law—thus guaranteeing that the member banks shall not accept deposits out of all proportion to a safe margin of operation; second, to rediscount certain obligations on which the member banks have already lent money, thus making available to member banks additional funds; and third, to issue to member banks Federal Reserve notes, backed by a certain percentage of gold, so that these member banks may supply the needs of their customers for a cash medium of exchange in addition to that which the checking system supplies. The rate of rediscount is fixed by the various Federal Reserve banks subject to the approval of the Federal Reserve board, which may also in times of emergency, on a vote of five members, and with the approval of the President, increase or decrease the percentage of reserves to deposits which the member banks must carry with the Federal Reserve banks.

On the whole, the Federal Reserve System has worked very well. Its adoption in 1913 was followed in a few years by the Great War, and notwithstanding the stress to which it was subjected because of war conditions, it functioned excellently. The general banking break-down of March 1933, however, has caused many to question the banking situation, and unfortunately and most mistakenly it has been argued that this break-down arose through weakness in the Federal Reserve System.

There is no question but that the failure of so many banks and the suspension of all banking for a short time came about as a result of a sudden deflation in all values. This is not the time or place to discuss the original causes of the depression. It is an accepted fact, however, that the deflation owed its severity to the enormous inflation of credit and of values which occurred just beforehand. It is argued that if the Federal Reserve Board had greater power over the Federal Reserve banks, and through them over the member banks, the enormous inflation would have been repressed, and therefore the resulting deflation would not have been so severe. They argue that if the Federal Reserve Board's power over the Federal Reserve banks is strengthened, if, in addition to its present control over the rediscount rate, it may change the reserve requirements of the member banks quickly and easily, and if it may force open-market operations on the Federal Reserve banks—that is, the buying and selling of Government and certain other types of obligations—inflation and deflation may be kept under control.

Such an argument is typical of a great many of the unsound theories which are expounded today. It attributes our difficulties to a weakness in machinery, when as a matter of fact the existing machinery is reasonably satisfactory, if only those operating it would use it properly. Unfortunately there were few in this country wise enough to realize in 1929 the disaster to which we were rushing, though it is a matter of record that the leading Federal Reserve bank of the country tried a number of times, without success, to induce the Federal Reserve Board at Washington to approve an increase in the rediscount rate to halt speculation.

It is not generally known that there are plenty of provisions in the present law which give to the Federal Reserve Board power to curb speculative activities, but they have not been exercised. It is simply an impossibility to expect any group of men to a great extent under the domination of an administration in power, to do anything as unpopular as trying to stop a boom, whether sound or otherwise. The brakes might possibly be set by a board wholly free of any political domination, but the increase of governmental control makes less the likelihood of wise action.

Now let us see what we are asked to do in this legislation which was drafted by the newly appointed Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and its adoption urged by the President over the radio a week ago.

This law will increase, first, the power of the President over the Federal Reserve Board, for it contains for the first time a provision that the Governor and Vice Governor of the Board shall serve only at his pleasure. Second, it increases the power of the Federal Reserve Board over the Federal Reserve banks, by providing that hereafter the chief executive officer of each bank shall be subject to the approval of the Board. Third, it gives the Federal Reserve Board the power, acting perhaps by a bare majority of a bare quorum, or three members, to change the reserve requirements of the member banks at will. Fourth, it gives the Federal Reserve Board the right to force the Federal Reserve banks to participate irrespective of their own wishes in open-market operations. Thus, by a series of steps there is given the President, working through his control over the Federal Reserve Board, new and greater powers over the lifeblood of the country—its credit system.

The right to raise reserve requirements is the right to curtail, or even stop entirely, the normal banking function of lending. The right to lower reserve requirements brings the possibility of endangering deposits by requiring insufficient reserves. Neither power ought to be lightly exercised.

The right to require participation in open-market operations is, however, the most dangerous part of this legislation, for behind it there lurks a sinister shadow. It is well known that today the Government is operating with continued deficits, a situation which must cease in the near future if a collapse of Government credit is to be avoided. These deficits are financed by the sale of Government bonds. Government financing should be on the same basis as private financing—that is, a free and open market, where the savings of the people are voluntarily used in the purchase of Government obligations.

Most of us realize the dangers of the financing of Government deficits by the issue of fiat or printing-press money, mere pieces of paper with nothing behind them but the bare promise of the Government. We know that when this happens the value of such money goes down with increasing rapidity, while living costs mount proportionately. What few realize, however, is that when the Government uses compulsion to force unwilling purchasers to take its bonds, it might just as well turn to the printing press. There is no essential difference between compulsory financing of Government deficits by the issue of obligations bearing interest, which are bonds, and obligations without interest, which are printing-press money. Such compulsion in the buying of bonds is perhaps even worse than printing-press money, because more insidious. When the Government grinds the printing press we know it, and we have at least a danger signal before our eyes, but under the provisions of this bill Federal Reserve banks could be forced to take large sums of bonds against their will and against the judgment of all sound bankers, and yet it might appear for the time being that the Government's credit was unimpaired. The resulting collapse would be all the more severe. Financing of this nature is nothing more than a forced loan and is one of the vicious inroads on liberty which have been fought by free peoples for hundreds of years.

That you may not think that I am merely conjuring up harmless ghosts, let me point out that all civilized countries now under a democratic form of government have central banks even further removed from direct government control than is our central system today. Only in Italy and Russia is the situation different. In Italy the central bank is privately owned, but subject to government edict. In Russia all banks are owned by the government, and operated under the iron hand of dictatorship.

There has been no showing of any emergency which requires this legislation. It is only another request for power of the type with which we have become all too familiar in the past 2 years. This time, however, the power is to be exercised over the most delicate portion of our economic system, the credit structure. The possible results of a selfish or unwise exercise of this power are too distressing to contemplate. Basic changes in the Federal Reserve Act should only be made after study as careful and as detailed as preceded its original enactment.

AID FOR MENHADEN-FISH INDUSTRY

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record and to include therein a memorial to Congress from the Legislature of the State of Florida.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, the menhaden-fish industry is one of the most important in Florida. We have five or more large plants which manufacture fish meal and fish scrap. This industry in Florida and other States is threatened through the importation of foreign products manufactured by cheap labor. With a tax of five-eighths of a cent per pound on the foreign product, our own industries can survive. We are asking the Ways and Means Committee to report the Bland bill, H. R. 7569, which carries this provision and thus offers the necessary protection to our American industry. The Florida Legislature, now in session, has just passed House Memorial No. 7, urging the Congress to pass the bill. The memorial follows:

Memorial to Congress requesting that the Congress of the United States without further delay pass the Bland bill, H. R. 7569

Whereas there are five menhaden-fish fertilizer plants located in different sections of the State of Florida, employing over 2,000 of our citizens; and

Whereas there is a great amount of menhaden-fish scrap and menhaden-fish meal being shipped into the United States and into the State of Florida by foreign nations, who, because of cheap labor, can sell their products at a price far below the cost of producing these products in our State; and

Whereas unless relief is given the citizens of our State connected with the menhaden-fish industry will be forced out of business and employment of our citizens will be curtailed; and

Whereas the Bland bill, being H. R. 7569, in the Congress of the United States, provides for a five-eighths of a cent tax on each pound of menhaden-fish meal and menhaden-fish scrap shipped into this country by other nations; and

Whereas the Bland bill has the endorsement of those citizens of the States of Virginia and Maryland engaged in this industry, as well as a great many of the people of our country; and

Whereas enactment of this bill into law will have a vital effect on the menhaden-fish industry in our Nation and our State; and

Whereas it alone will increase by $300,000 the annual pay rolls of the five menhaden-fish fertilizer plants in this State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of your memorialists, the members of the Florida Legislative Assembly of the State of Florida, the senate and the house concurring, that the Congress of the United States should enact the Bland bill without further delay; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial, duly authenticated, be sent by the secretary of State to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from this State, to the President of the United States, and to Congressman SCHUYLER O. BLAND.

Approved by the Governor May 1, 1935.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FARLEY for 3 days, on account of important business.

SENATE

THURSDAY, MAY 9, 1935

(Legislative day of Tuesday, May 7, 1935)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Wednesday, May 8, 1935, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

TRIBUTES TO THE LATE SENATOR CUTTING

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Yankee Division Veterans Association, at Bridgeport, Conn., which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution passed by the Yankee Division Veterans Association, of Bridgeport, Conn., at its May 6, 1935, meeting at Bridgeport, concerning the untimely death of Bronson M. Cutting, United States Senator from the State of New Mexico

In recognition of the long and untiring services of Senator Cutting to his State and country; his unselfish stand at all times in matters pertaining to veteran legislation, particularly his recent attitude and definite liberal stand taken on the more recent veteran legislation appearing before Congress; his devotion to the welfare of the disabled veterans of the World War, particularly his untiring efforts in bearing the brunt of the fight in favor of the disabled veterans and all veterans in the last Congress in connection with his stand on the economy bill, the Yankee Veterans Association at this meeting in Bridgeport, Conn., on May 6, 1935, wishes to express its sense of personal loss in his death, and its utmost appreciation of his service to the veteran.

Having served his country in war as well as in peace, and meeting his untimely death while en route to further the cause of the veteran, this association feels that it truly has lost a great friend, and he will be sadly and keenly missed by the people of the State of New Mexico—a truly great American, liberal and statesman, and the members of this association feel that his loss is a great one to the entire country at large: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this expression of appreciation and sympathy be sent to the bereaved mother and family, and also that these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this meeting; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent that august body, the Senate of these great United States.

YANKEE DIVISION VETERANS ASSOCIATION,
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.,

By GEORGE W. WEST, President.

Attest:

JOHN SCHULTZ, Secretary.

Mr. WHEELER presented a telegram from the Silver Bow County Trades and Labor Council, Butte, Mont., which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUTTE, MONT., May 9, 1935.

Senator B. K. WHEELER,

Senate Office, Washington, D. C.:

The labor movement of Silver Bow County desire to have you express to the United States Senate our most profound grief of the untimely death of labor's friend, Senator Cutting.

HARRY J. GRIMES,

Secretary Silver Bow Trades and Labor Council.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON subsequently said: Mr. President, I find that it will be inconvenient for the Senate to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the order heretofore entered that when the Senate concludes its business today it take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yesterday I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill 3896, being the so-called "bonus bill", was passed by the Senate. At this time I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill 3896 was ordered to a third reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

CITY OF BALTIMORE—WITHDRAWAL OF MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. KING. Mr. President, several days ago I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 672) for the relief of the city of Baltimore was passed. I now desire to withdraw the motion.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the petitions of Pleas Gammage, of Tunica, Miss., and Miss Alice Philips, of Kingsport, Tenn., praying for the enactment of old-age pension legislation, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the State of New York, praying for an investigation of charges filed by the Women's Committee of Louisiana relative to the qualifications of the Senators from Louisiana, Mr. LONG and Mr. OVERTON, which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of Milton, Mass., Detroit, Mich., and Union City, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the immediate cash payment of adjusted-service certificates of World War veterans, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER presented the following memorial of the Legislature of the State of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

House Memorial No. 8

A memorial to the Congress and the President of the United States of America, requesting the establishment and location, at the earliest possible time, of an Army Air Service base as herein referred to

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States of America legislation seeking a large expansion of the Army Air Service; and

Whereas climatic and atmospheric conditions of the great State of Florida offer unsurpassed qualities for all-year training of aviators; and

Whereas at this time most of the Army air fields are located in the west and southwest portions of the United States; and

Whereas the great State of Florida is in close proximity to the large population centers of the United States; and

Whereas the Big Prairie is the most desirable location for an air base on our mainland closest to the Panama Canal, Puerto Rico, Guantanamo, and the Caribbean; and

Whereas the Army Air Service, during the World War, with the advice and counsel of well-known experts of the Allied air forces, established Carlstrom and Dorr Fields, in De Soto County, Fla., for the training of aviators; and

Whereas statistics in the archives of the War Department show conclusively that these fields furnish a larger number of flying days than any other field in the United States; and

Whereas the great State of Florida has more coastline than any State in the Union, and in the event of war it is more exposed to attack from naval and air expeditions by the enemy than any other portion of this Union; and

Whereas the citizens of Arcadia, in De Soto County, Fla., have offered as a gift a tract of land composed of 10,000 acres, located on the Big Prairie of De Soto, Hardee, Highlands, Glades, and Charlotte Counties for the establishment of an Army air base; and

Whereas the location of this large tract is ideal for the purpose and strategic in the event of war, because it is situated almost half-way between the east and west coast of south Florida; and

Whereas the establishment of an air base near Arcadia would decrease very materially great unemployment resulting from the disaster of a freeze in December 1934: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of your memorialists, the members of the 1935 Legislative Assembly of the State of Florida, the senate and the house concurring, that the Government of the United States take such steps at the earliest possible time to establish and locate an Army Air Service base in De Soto County, Fla.; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial, duly authenticated, be sent to the President of the United States, President of the Senate, and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative in the Congress from this State, and to the Secretary of War.

Approved by the Governor May 3, 1935.

Mr. DUFFY presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution memorializing the President and Congress of the United States and the Administrator of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration to provide for the continuance of aid in lime and marl production

Whereas on May 1, 1935, the Federal Government will discontinue its aid in the production of crushed limestone; and

Whereas it is of great importance to this State that crushed lime and marl production continue at this time for the following reasons:

1. Approximately 85 percent of the production soil of this State is in great need of acid-neutralizing elements and fertilizers which are essential to the successful production of crops, especially alfalfa.

2. There is now a serious shortage in cattle feed which seriously affects the cattle industry in this State, and which shortage can be largely overcome by creating a greater productive activity in the soil.

3. Such acid-neutralizing elements and fertilizers are abundant in crushed lime and marl.

4. A large number of otherwise unemployed could be engaged in a profitable undertaking.

5. Production of crushed lime and marl is more profitable to the producer during the warmer months and a greater production is possible, the reasons being obvious.

6. Lime crushed during the warmer months can be applied to the soil in the fall of the year and thereby be permitted to disintegrate and become thoroughly mixed with the soil during the winter months and be an effective productive agent the following spring: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Wisconsin Legislature respectfully requests the Congress of the United States to provide for the immediate and further production of crushed lime and marl for farm application; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to Harry L. Hopkins, Administrator of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, to each Wisconsin Member of Congress, and to Bruce Uthus, director of the work division of the Wisconsin Emergency Relief Administration.

HARRY W. BOLENS,
President pro tempore of the Senate.
LAWRENCE R. LARSEN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
J. W. CAROW,
Speaker of the Assembly.
LESTER R. JOHNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. DUFFY also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution petitioning the National Emergency Council and the Works Allotment Board to create a mining works project in the dormant southwestern Wisconsin mineral area

Whereas $4,880,000,000 have been appropriated by the Congress of the United States to defray the cost of various types of practical wealth-producing, self-liquidating works projects by virtue of which unemployed men and women may be furnished self-respecting jobs in lieu of the demoralizing dole and the United States Government may be relieved of the direct relief business; and

Whereas extensive mineral fields in southwestern Wisconsin, rich in lead, zinc, and sulphur deposits, now lie practically dormant due to present abnormally low market prices for such minerals; and

Whereas this area has a stranded mining population of approximately 1,000 families, most of whom are now unemployed and many actually on relief rolls; and

Whereas operation of these mines would furnish employment to all these unemployed miners and several thousand other unemployed persons; and

Whereas by pegging the per ton price on raised ores to a level commensurate with adequate living wages for miners and on the basis of index prices in any normal pre-war period, and by purchasing the same at such prices for indefinite storage against time of war or other demand therefor, the National Emergency Council and the Works Allotment Board could devise for this stranded area and its unemployed population a practical wealth-producing and self-liquidating work project and thereby put these mines in operation and the unemployed miners to work: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That this legislature earnestly petitions the National Emergency Council and the Works Allotment Board to give serious consideration to creating an appropriate and practical lead, zinc, and sulphur mining works project in the southwestern mineral area of this State for the paramount purpose of creating wealth and employment; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the National Emergency Council, and the Works Allotment Board, and to each Wisconsin Member of the Congress.

HARRY W. BOLENS,
President pro tempore of the Senate.
LAWRENCE R. LARSEN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
J. W. CAROW,
Speaker of the Assembly.
LESTER R. JOHNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by members of the Polish-American Citizens of the Triple Cities, at Binghamton, N. Y., favoring the enactment of legislation providing that October 11 in each year be designated as a legal holiday in commemoration of the death of Gen. Casimir Pulaski, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Department of Christian Social Service of the Diocese of Long Island, Brooklyn, N. Y., favoring the enactment of legislation modifying existing laws concerning the dissemination of birth-control information, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the State Council of New York, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, protesting against the enactment of legislation that will weaken the existing Alien Deportation Law, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, the textile industry is the second largest of our country. It affects the homes and the living conditions of 9,000,000 people of New England, as well as millions throughout the South.

It is reported that closed hearings are now being held dealing with the situation, but it seems to me these hearings should be public, so that the people affected may know just what is taking place and may have an opportunity to offer their suggestions.

In that connection, I ask that unanimous consent be granted for the printing in the RECORD and appropriate reference of a telegram from the secretary of the Vermont Chamber of Commerce.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BURLINGTON, VT., May 8, 1935.

Senator E. W. GIBSON,
Washington, D. C.:

What appear to be star-chamber hearings on textile matters cause alarm in New England communities. Why not public hearings on questions which affect second largest industry in America and concern 9,000,000 New England people and other millions in other States? Please use your influence.

JAMES P. TAYLOR,
Secretary of the State Chamber of Commerce.

IMPORTATIONS FROM THE ORIENT

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, we still have millions out of employment. The American Federation of Labor has been giving thoughtful consideration to the relief of this condition. It appears to many that the importation of cheap oriental goods is one of the contributing causes for unemployment in this country.

To show the opinion of the labor unions, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a letter from the Central Labor Union of Barre, Vt.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BARRE, VT., May 2, 1935.

Senator ERNEST W. GIBSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The Central Labor Union of Barre and vicinity are making a protest through you to the Federal Government to prohibit the import of Japanese products in our country.

We feel that, indirectly, this is the cause of unemployment in this country.

We petition you to vote for a higher tariff on all imports from Japan and other countries which export products to this country; which endanger our industries by their use of cheap labor and material.

Yours very truly,

W. H. EAGER, Secretary.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILROADS

Mr. WHEELER presented a telegram from L. E. Bordwell, chairman of the board of directors, Mandan, N. Dak., which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MANDAN, N. DAK., May 7, 1935.

Hon. B. K. WHEELER,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.:

Today's decision voiding Railroad Retirement Act should cement entire Congress and public sentiment back of your bill for Government ownership rail carriers. Rail workers under the Railroad Employees National Pension Association leadership stunned to the quick by Court's decision; look to you to make intensive drive for national ownership.

L. E. BORDWELL,
Chairman Board of Directors.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BYRNES, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7672) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 598) thereon.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2278) authorizing the construction of buildings for the United States High Commissioner to the Government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 599) thereon.

Mr. COPELAND, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2625) to extend the facilities of the Public Health Service to seamen on Government vessels not in the Military or Naval Establishment, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 600) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2681) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across Lake Champlain at or near West Swanton, Vt., and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 601) thereon.

Mr. NEELY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 2512) to define lobbyists, to require registration of lobbyists, and provide regulation thereof, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 602) thereon.

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 2367) to create the Farmers' Home Corporation, to promote more secure occupancy of farms and farm homes, to correct the economic instability resulting from some present forms of farm tenancy, to engage in rural rehabilitation, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 603) thereon.

Mr. MINTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 119) remanding the claim of W. K. Richardson, covered by Senate Joint Resolution 35, to the Court of Claims, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 604) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BULOW:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) relating to the sale, reorganization, or dismemberment of the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railroad Co.; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

INTERSTATE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION

Mr. WAGNER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I also ask that there be printed in the RECORD along with the bill a statement explanatory of the proposed legislation.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2793) to provide compensation for disability or death resulting from injury to employees in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The statement presented by Mr. WAGNER was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY MR. WAGNER

This bill extends the principle of workmen's compensation for industrial accidents to interstate-commerce employees operating railroads, express- and sleeping-car companies, airplanes, and other vehicles moving along regular routes. It renovates the antiquated system of employers' liability established by the Federal act of 1908. It is the logical supplement not only to similar laws already adopted in 44 States but also to acts of Congress protecting civilian employees of the Government, longshoremen and harbor workers, and private employees in the District of Columbia.

The bill provides exclusive and absolute liability for injury or death due to accidents in interstate transportation. It sets forth a carefully calculated scale of benefits, shifting to meet every standard type of injury, and in case of death not neglectful of the number of dependents in the decedent's family. In addition, the measure contemplates accident prevention work and the rehabilitation of disabled workers.

Major costs are assessed against the carriers in the form of insurance requirements, similar to the procedure in many States, including New York, Georgia, North Carolina, Texas, Virginia, Maryland, and New Jersey. A Federal appropriation of $250,000 is inserted in order to get the work started.

The proposed act is to be administered by a representative commission of three members, appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, and serving 6-year terms. Under its supervision deputy commissioners in the several States, or in other appropriate administrative areas, will hear claims and award compensation. All questions of law will be reviewable in the appropriate district courts.

It should be stated that the recent decision in the railway pension case in no way affects the authority of Congress to enact workmen's compensation laws covering interstate employees. In fact, the Court expressly distinguished this function. And the time is certainly at hand when 2,000,000 employees, who cannot be protected in any other way and who constitute the largest unitary group thus far neglected, should be brought under the protective arm of a comprehensive Federal statute.

THE COLONY OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. LONERGAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 133) which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 19,000 additional copies of Senate Document 53, current session, entitled "The Colony of Connecticut and Its Beginning, Growth, and Characteristics to the Observance of Its Tercentenary Celebration in 1935", be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL

Mr. BILBO submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6732) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF SECURITIES ACT OF 1933—AMENDMENT

Mr. BORAH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2461) to amend the Securities Act of 1933, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF PHILIPPINE AFFAIRS—REPORT OF SENATOR GIBSON (S. DOC. NO. 57, PT. 2)

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, during the second session of the Seventy-third Congress the President of the Senate appointed a special committee to conduct an investigation and hold hearings in the Philippine Islands pursuant to a suggestion from the President of the United States, as contained in his communication of June 16, 1934. The committee so appointed has discharged its duty, and I now present my report to the Senate, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that the order heretofore made to print it in connection with a similar report of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] be rescinded, and that it be printed as part 2 of Senate Document No. 57.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed as a document, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT AS MEMBER OF THE PHILIPPINE MISSION
INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS IN THE PHILIPPINES

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE:

The special committee to conduct hearings and investigations in the Philippine Islands was appointed by the President of the Senate upon the suggestion of the President of the United States, contained in his communication of June 16, 1934. The committee arrived in Manila, December 9, 1934, having taken advantage of brief stops while en route to study economic conditions in Hawaii, Japan, and China.

The committee during the course of its Philippine investigation visited several of the more important islands, conducted hearings, talked with officials, received hundreds of memorials, interviewed peoples of all classes, and conferred at length with responsible members of the Philippine Legislature and the constitutional convention. Other outstanding leaders of the Filipino people were also consulted. The committee had the assistance of our able and efficient Governor General and his staff, as also that of the commanding general of the Department of the Philippines and of the commander of the Asiatic Fleet. The newspapers, trade organizations, civic groups, and those splendid American pioneers who have been powerful factors in building up the Philippines were also most cooperative and helpful.

The chairman of the committee addressed the people through the constitutional convention, setting forth clearly the political and economic problems of independence as viewed by the members of the committee and warning them of the dangers they must face and the problems they must solve upon assuming an independent status.

The author of this report traveled several hundred miles through the island of Luzon, visiting many Provinces and barrios, where he conferred with officials, came into contact with the common people, and observed economic conditions as they affect the great mass of the Filipino people, in order that he might form an opinion concerning the effect of independence, under the terms of the Tydings-McDuffie Act, upon the economic life of the Filipinos themselves.

It may not be amiss to call attention briefly to some outstanding facts concerning the Philippines.

The archipelago extends a thousand miles north and south off the coast of Asia. The most northerly island is less than 100 miles from Japan (Formosa) and the most southern, but a few miles from British Borneo and the Dutch East Indies. The geographical situation places the islands between great powers contending for the trade of the Orient and athwart the lanes of trade which supply the needs of more than half the peoples of the world. There are over 7,000 islands in the Philippine group, more than 6,000 of which have an area of less than a square mile each. Over a thousand of them are large enough to cultivate and to sustain human life. The largest of the islands is Luzon, with an area of 40,814 square miles. Mindanao comes second, with an area of 36,906 square miles. The total area of the archipelago is 114,400 square miles, larger than 15 countries of Europe and of 10 countries in the Americas. The coast line is twice as long as that of continental United States. The population is over 13,000,000, having nearly doubled since the American occupation. The population density is only 111 to the square mile as against 433.3 for Japan proper and 290 for the populous Provinces of China. It is estimated that the Philippines could support a population of 60,000,000.

The Filipino people are of Malayan stock; other peoples found in the islands are principally Chinese, American, and Japanese, the latter being scattered throughout the islands and also grouped in a settlement at Davao, which maintains direct commercial relations with Japan.

There are several major languages in use, with some 60 or 70 modifying dialects, each spoken by a fraction of the population. Spain failed to establish a common language which is so essential to national unity, and the United States has not been altogether successful in its efforts to do so, although the advance of the English language has been greater than that of Spanish during 300 years of the rule of Spain.

RESOURCES OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

The Philippine Islands is one of the richest dependencies in the world—a land of opportunity. It is one of the few sections that have been relatively free from the effects of the depression. The country is rich in natural resources. The Philippine forest reserve is enormous. It is estimated that at the present time it can produce 486,000,000 board-feet of timber of commercial importance, and, in addition, second growth offers an inestimable future supply. The Government owns 97.5 percent of the total forest area, and the annual net income from timber royalties is about $400,000. The industry produces large quantities of lumber of local consumption as well as for export. In 1933, over 172,000,000 board-feet of lumber were manufactured and more than 460,000,000 board-feet of logs were cut.

The Philippine Islands is also rich in minerals, containing deposits of gold, silver, copper, lead, zinc, iron, manganese, chromium, coal, salt, sulphur, and building and monumental stone.

Gold has been found in all sections. It is estimated that the value of gold produced in 1934, by methods not wholly up to date or efficient, was more than $12,000,000, and it is estimated further that the 1935 production will be $18,000,000. Prediction is made by experts that the Philippines will soon become one of the great gold-producing areas of the world. The capital invested in the mines is largely of American and foreign origin.

Copper is found in rich pockets running from 10 to 20 percent and in some cases as high as 40 percent.

There are several important deposits of iron. The Calambayunan and Larap deposits consist of almost pure massive or granular hematite with traces of magnetite and carries an average of 60 percent iron. The Surigao deposit runs about 52 percent iron and is estimated to contain 500,000,000 metric tons of ore.

The most extensive deposits of war material in the world in the form of chromium are found in the Philippine Islands, some of which carry approximately 40 percent of chromium oxide. Since the world's supply is limited, the great importance of the deposit cannot be overestimated. Millions of tons of high-grade, low-cost chrome ore are available. Coal is mined in a substantial quantity, as is asphalt, asbestos, gypsum, and sulphur.

The value of the 1,500 fish meat edibles obtained off the coast of the islands is enormous; local consumption is valued at about $50,000,000 annually. Fishing in insular waters is largely in control of the Japanese; of the 104 commercial fishing boats registered, 62 are of Japanese ownership. The value of Philippine farm products is more than $142,000,000 annually.

The islands are rich in everything that is naturally coveted by grasping nations, and the location of the Philippines places them in the center of the political and economic struggle of some of the great imperialistic countries of the world.

POLITICAL BACKGROUND

The people of the Philippine Islands have been under the control of many countries. They have been in turn subject to the Asiatic control of Hindu Malayan empires, to control by China and Japan, to European control by Portugal and Spain, and to American control. Spain gained ascendancy in 1565 and exercised administrative control for years through Mexico, then known as New Spain. Spain continued in power until 1898, although Portugal, the Netherlands, and England made attempts to overthrow her. Each of the nations ruling the Philippines has stamped its influence on customs, business, law, religion, language, and the life of the country. The Filipinos have been a dependent people for more than 500 years.

American control began upon the occupation of Manila August 14, 1898. Philippine Archipelago was ceded to us by Spain under the Treaty of Paris and the United States paid $20,000,000 for the transfer of sovereignty, for lands, and to remove claims by the Government of Spain.

The Supreme Court, in considering the situation created by the treaty, said, in 183 U. S. at 176, 180:

"By the third article of the treaty Spain ceded to the United States 'the archipelago known as the Philippine Islands.' . . . The Philippines thereby ceased, in the language of the treaty, 'to be Spanish.' Ceasing to be Spanish, they ceased to be foreign country. They came under the complete and absolute sovereignty and dominion of the United States, and so became territory of the United States over which civil government could be established. . . . The Philippines were not simply occupied but acquired, and having been granted and delivered to the United States by their former master were no longer under the sovereignty of any foreign nation. . . . Spain granted the islands to the United States, and the grantee in accepting them took nothing less than the whole grant."

The situation of the Government with respect to the acquisition of territory added since the Republic was organized was set forth by the Supreme Court in 19 Howard (U. S. C. 393, 448).

"It (Louisiana Territory) was acquired by the General Government as the representative and trustee of the people of the United States, and it must therefore be held in that character for their common and equal benefit; for it was the people of the several States, acting through their agent and representative—the Federal Government—who in fact acquired the territory in question, and the Government holds it for their common use until it shall be associated with the other States as a member of the Union."

This decision makes it clear that, generally speaking, sovereignty rests with the United States Government as agent for the people. Chief Executives, however, have indicated that our control over the Philippines would be only temporary and that we would eventually establish a stable government and then withdraw. Congress, in the act of October 1916, declared this to be the purpose of the United States. The right of Congress to alienate the sovereignty of the United States over land and peoples to which it has become attached is, to the author of this report, extremely doubtful. It is a question which must eventually be determined by the highest court of the land.

THE WORK OF OUR COUNTRY

The United States established a stable government and proceeded to develop the island by building roads, schoolhouses, and hospitals, establishing a system of public education, teaching sanitation, educating nurses, physicians, and surgeons, and instructing in the art of practical agriculture. We reformed the judicial system; we provided towns with modern sewer system and with pure-water systems. We encouraged business and raised the standard of living in the islands over 200 percent above that of peoples of neighboring countries. Under our protection they were left undisturbed during the World War. In short, we did everything to make the government of the Philippines the helpful servant of its people. We built on the splendid foundations of the American Republic. The history of the world does not reveal another such example of unselfish work and sacrifice in behalf of a dependent people. In contrast with the world's colonial powers, we have never commercialized our rule nor encouraged private concerns to control and direct the business of the people. We have given to individual initiative the same opportunity that obtains on our mainland, and to the people we have offered as great a measure of freedom as we enjoy at home.

The Filipino people have insistently demanded the fulfillment of our promise of independence and have sent commissions to the United States to secure action. Congress, to carry out that promise, passed what is known as the "Hawes-Cutting bill." This met with opposition from a powerful political group of Filipinos and was eventually rejected by the Philippine Legislature. Another mission came, and as a result of conferences the so-called "Tydings-McDuffie Act" was passed. The act was signed by the President, approved by the Philippine Legislature, and is now the law that fixes our future relations.

The Independence Act provides, among other things, for the adoption of a constitution to be approved by vote of the Philippine people (which is the only plebiscite given them); this constitution has been duly certified by the President. It also provides for trade relations during the period of the Commonwealth government, and eventually for complete severance of control by the United States.

Such a severance means that the Philippines must support its own army, navy, diplomatic and consular services, finance its own government, and find markets for products grown and for goods manufactured, because the free-trade markets with the United States, which the islands have enjoyed for 25 years, will be closed except upon payment of the same duties now paid by other countries. In securing these markets the Filipinos must compete with other oriental countries, where the scale of living is much lower and the prices paid for labor only a fraction of that now paid in the Philippines.

TRADE

Our trade with the Philippines is an important factor to be considered in a survey and estimate of the situation and in determining our future relations. The story of its growth is a remarkable one. In 1900 our share in the combined export and import trade was 11 percent; in 1933, 78 percent; in 1901 the United States supplied 12 percent of Philippine imports; in 1930 to 1932, 64 percent. In 1901 we absorbed 18 percent of the total exports of the islands; 82 percent in 1930 to 1932; and 89 percent during the first 6 months of 1934.

The Philippines ranked ninth in importance as a market for our goods in 1933, taking more than Belgium, Mexico, Argentina, Spain, Brazil, Australia, or Cuba; more than our combined exports to Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Switzerland; more than to Brazil and Colombia combined, or Switzerland, Colombia, Honduras, Haiti, Guatemala, Costa Rica, El Salvador, and Nicaragua. Of animal and vegetable products, which are composed largely of manufactured farm products, we sold more than to Cuba or the combined sales to Japan and Italy, or to Sweden and Denmark, or to Norway, Switzerland, Spain, New Zealand, and the Union of South Africa combined.

The Philippines were 60 percent more important as a market for American textiles than Cuba; 30 percent more important than Belgium, and more important than Argentina, Colombia, and Mexico combined.

As a consuming market for American goods the Philippines occupied the following ranks in 1933: Thirteenth for wood and paper products and for new metallic minerals; twelfth for machinery and vehicles (surpassing Italy, Germany, Australia, and China and equalling Switzerland and Soviet Russia combined); eighth for metals and manufactures except machinery and vehicles (exceeded the trade of Brazil and equalling that of Italy and Sweden combined); fifth for chemicals and related products (exceeded only by Canada, the United Kingdom, France, Germany, and Japan); second for wheat flour, canned fish, and cotton fabrics by the pound; first for milk and cream, both condensed and evaporated; for cotton cloth, colored, bleached, and unbleached; for galvanized iron and steel sheets; for ready-mixed paints.

The Philippines take 32 percent of our exports of colored cotton cloths, 52 percent of our bleached cotton cloth, 23 percent of our cotton fabrics by the pound, and 57 percent of our evaporated milk and cream.

In 1933, of the imports into the islands, the United States supplied 63 percent of the cotton goods; 74 percent of the iron and steel; nearly three-fourths of the wheat flour; half of the meat and dairy products; 80 percent of the automobiles; 88 percent of the mineral oils; and 69 percent of paper and its allied manufactures. Only eight countries purchased more of our products than the Philippine Islands, and no country purchased more of Philippine products than the United States.

All of the industries interested, especially producers of dairy products and the producers of cotton throughout the South and the manufacturers of cotton goods throughout the North, must be directly interested in the solution of the present-day Philippine problem.

And that is not all. The Philippine market must be considered in connection with other markets of the Pacific area; China and India are in a period of industrialization. While this will tend to supply some of their needs, yet industrialization has always raised buying power and increased demand. These countries will increase their demands for cotton, wheat, and foodstuffs. The United States should be in a position to claim its share in their markets. The Philippine Islands hold the key to our Pacific trade. The Far East is the world's greatest potential market today. America should be in the Far Eastern trade to stay, for its trade has attained considerable proportion, representing in value at present upward of $1,000,000,000 a year. This is nearly one-quarter of the total foreign trade of the United States and exceeds that of South America.

When we consider, however, the entire exports of the United States, we find that the Philippines take only about 3 percent of our entire exports, while the United States takes over 80 percent of exports from the islands. So it follows that we can get along without their market, but the Philippines cannot get along without ours.

THE TYDINGS-McDUFFIE ACT

The Tydings-McDuffie Act, with which we must specifically deal, provides for changes in the trade relations that will materially affect the volume of imports from and exports to the islands. Quota restrictions and export taxes are to be applied during specific periods under the Commonwealth government. Full independence is provided for in 10 years and means a complete break of the economic and political bonds which have united us. The Philippine Islands will then assume the status of a foreign country and will be treated exactly as any other foreign country unless some new arrangement by way of a trade agreement is entered into.

Prior to the establishment of the Commonwealth Government, no change in trade relations is made by the independence act. The Jones-Costigan Act fixing the sugar quota does, however, work some change, and so does the imposition of an excise tax on the first processing of oils equivalent to 3 cents per pound on oil pressed from Philippine copra. This gives Philippine copra a 2-cent preference as compared with the 5-cent rate on coconut oil originating in other countries.

In the period of the Commonwealth Government two changes appear. During the first 5 years of that government, duty-free quotas are imposed upon the amounts of sugar, coconut oil, and cordage which may be imported into the United States. For sugar the limit is 50,000 long tons of refined sugar and 800,000 long tons of unrefined. The duty-free quota for coconut oil is 200,000 long tons and for cordage 3,000,000 pounds. Shipments in excess of the quotas will pay full duty after the inauguration of the Commonwealth Government. These are the only restrictions aside from the export taxes during the sixth and successive years of that government. Except for these restrictions, free trade will continue to prevail.

During the second 5 years of the Commonwealth Government, provision is made for a new type of restriction in the form of a progressive export tax to be collected by the Philippines on all shipments to the United States of insular products, provided such products cannot enter the United States free of duty when imported from other countries. Shipments of sugar, coconut oil, and cordage, under the quotas already mentioned, are included in this provision. These export taxes are fixed at 5 percent of the United States tariff rates for the sixth year of the Commonwealth Government and increase 5 percent each year until they reach 25 percent in the tenth year. The principal commodities affected are sugar, coconut oil, desiccated coconut, cordage, cigars, embroideries, hats, and buttons.

The object of this tax is to afford the Filipino people an opportunity to adjust themselves to the new conditions they must face after independence, and to provide for the payment of the bonds of the Philippine Government and its subdivisions; bonds, which, though not guaranteed by this Government, yet were sold by us and, therefore, bear our implied approval.

After independence becomes a fact, then all Philippine goods must bear the full rate of duty. The act provides, however, that before the time fixed for independence a conference shall be held for the purpose of making recommendations as to future trade relations.

FILIPINO OBJECTIONS

Filipino leaders have never fully assented to the economic provisions of the Tydings-McDuffie Act. They take the position that they acquiesced only because of a reliance on statements made by the President that if imperfections and inequalities exist they could be adjusted through a conference. They believe, and rightly, that the provisions of the act jeopardize the success of any independent government they may set up, and will result in a collapse of their social and economic structure. They object to the quotas, to the export-tax provisions, and claim that the period within which economic adjustments are to take place is too short. They object to a discontinuance of the free-trade relations after independence is achieved and ask for full-trade and tariff autonomy during the commonwealth period. In the words of Manuel L. Quezon, president of the Philippine Senate, a most able leader and who, more than any other man, controls the situation, "In order that the government of the Commonwealth might be safe and assured of success, it is necessary that all economic provisions be amended." He called for elimination of the provisions of the Tydings-McDuffie Act, imposing the export tax, for higher quotas; and for a permanent agreement as to trade relations with the United States, which, of course, means continuance of free trade with the islands. He apparently accepts the theory that the closing of American markets strikes a death blow to the economic life of the Philippines.

The specific amendments to the Tydings-McDuffie Act to accomplish the Filipino demands may be enumerated as follows:

- (1) Elimination of subsection (e) of section 6, providing for export taxes;
- (2) Amendment of subsections (a) and (c) of section 6, raising the sugar and cordage quotas;
- (3) Amendment of sections 2 (a), 5, 9, and 10 so as to give full autonomy in tariff and fiscal matters to the Philippine Commonwealth government;
- (4) Amendment to section 13 changing the time for the conference to formulate policies for future commercial relations to 2 years before complete independence. These amendments cover practically all of the trade provisions of the Independence Act.

In other words, the claim is made that each and every trade provision of the Tydings-McDuffie Act is unjust and unfair both severally and in anticipated collective effect. All of these objections are based on the fear of a prospective collapse of their social and economic structure following a closing of American markets and a return of the great mass of Filipinos to oriental standards of living. To these objections may be added that the Tydings-McDuffie Act does not give the full measure of independence expected, and that no final plebiscite is given the Filipino people in which to voice their direct and free approval of independence itself.

POLITICAL QUESTIONS INVOLVED IN INDEPENDENCE

Thus far we have dealt with economic provisions and objections naturally arising thereunder. In addition there are certain political questions which must be considered. These are well stated in a recent study and are suggested here for the consideration of the Congress:

- (1) Can an independent Philippine government maintain internal peace? Would internal political strife create international complications?
- (2) What will be the responsibility of the United States, if any, in preserving Philippine neutrality?
- (3) After independence, will the islands be forced into closer political and economic connections with any other country, and would such a situation become a disturbing factor to the peace of the Pacific?
- (4) Will the infiltration of other races prove a serious political problem?

In connection with these political questions it is well to consider the rapidly changing conditions in the Pacific. The following matters deserve special attention: The rise of an ambitious power to commanding influence guided toward its assumed destiny by able statesmen; the so-called "Asiatic Monroe Doctrine"; the fight for trade; the infiltration of Japanese into the Philippines; the placing of Japanese merchants in all parts of the islands—picked men with special knowledge of the vernacular and customs of the people; the establishment of the Japanese colony of 15,000 at Davao; the fact that Japanese corporations have acquired control of land by various methods and title to thousands of acres of land, either in fee simple or by leasehold rights, apart from sublease rights acquired from Filipinos; and that Japan by subsidizing college professors is pursuing the old policy of our public utilities and is carrying on a propaganda program with the object of ingratiating herself into the good will of the Filipino people. Japan, in fact, is moving in as we are moving out.

Some Filipinos claim that the Philippines would be safer under independence in dealing with Japan than under American sovereignty. This is an untenable proposition.

In considering the whole situation in the Orient, it may be well to bear in mind the interest of Great Britain and what may be done to protect her position. England, in the event of our final withdrawal, will not suffer any other nation to block her lanes of trade or endanger her free passage to Australia and to her many bases in the East. England does not willingly surrender a right she has won or give up a foot of territory under the British flag. As a measure of protection, her budget for military purposes is being materially increased. The situation created by our withdrawal may bring Japan and Great Britain face to face in the Philippines with a common problem. English diplomacy is not wholly altruistic as to objectives. A solution may force a secret treaty to delimitate spheres of influence and control the trade of the Philippines. The only safe way to judge the future is by the past; we cannot forget the secret treaty which was uncovered in the negotiations leading up to the Treaty of Versailles.

The effect of Japanese influence on our trade is already becoming apparent. The figures show some losses in our exports to the Philippines, particularly of cotton goods. In this commodity the Japanese supplied 52 percent of the quantity of Philippine imports during the first 10 months of 1934, as contrasted with 23.5 percent in 1933. During the same period imports of cotton cloth from the United States fell from 67 percent to about 41 percent.

OTHER QUESTIONS RAISED BY THE TYDINGS-McDUFFIE ACT

There are imperfections in the Tydings-McDuffie Act that directly affect our people. The justice of the act lies in the fact that it carries out any promise of independence that may bind us. The injustice lies in the fact that its provisions will cause us to lose a position of influence in the East and render it difficult to carry out any consistent far-eastern policy.

It will gain for us the reputation of deserting a problem before its solution.

It will help to turn back our race movement for the first time in its history.

It will make America, once the hope of Christendom, the leader in the retreat of the white man.

It will put us in a position of leaving a people we have promised to help at the mercy of grasping, imperialistic nations, unless and until a neutralization treaty can be negotiated—an idle dream.

It may operate to lose for us one of our best markets.

Under the terms of the act we are required, in effect, not only to give up the islands but to give them a bonus, coupled with their independence. We are required to make a tremendous financial sacrifice in the form of reservations, lands, hospitals, and other property involving many millions of dollars. It is true, however, that we will also be relieved of our annual expenditures in the islands.

There are certain fiscal problems brought to the Filipino by the independence act. The costs of government will be increased because of the necessity of performing services performed heretofore by the United States. Government income will be curtailed. Taxation must increase. Will the Filipino accept the additional burden? Will it be possible for the government to maintain present standards of service? If not, what will be the result in the present state of world relationship?

In dealing with the economic situation we can change the quotas, the export taxes, and the 10-year time limitation. We can amend the law so as to permit the negotiation of a trade agreement during the commonwealth period; or negotiate a trade agreement effective after full independence is achieved; or Congress can reduce duties, from whatever country imported, on certain articles which are of special interest to the Philippines. It must be borne in mind, however, that no trade agreement can become operative during the commonwealth period without further legislation, and that trade agreements, under existing law, can be entered into only with foreign countries. In any trade agreement we must meet the situations created by 30 recent treaties containing the most-favored-nation clause, and by the Cuban trade agreement.

It may be observed that, so far as the political situation is concerned, we have enacted the independence law. It is my opinion it should not have received the sanction of the Congress in its present form. I voted for it, and now tender my regrets for having done so. But it has been approved by the Philippine Legislature and constitutes an obligation which we cannot ignore. The economic provisions of the Tydings-McDuffie Act can be changed and the imperfections in inequalities adjusted. Even the political set-up can be changed, but this must be done upon the initiative of the Philippine people. We Americans are bound by what we have done. All of the Filipino leaders know the dangers that confront them, but, with the present political control, few will back a proposal for a change in the political part of the act. The situation affords an acid test of Filipino statesmanship of the present day.

Our course has been correct. The Filipino people have been warned of the direct effect of the independence act in clear and unmistakable language by the chairman of the committee in his address before the Philippine Constitutional Convention. This has already been set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 12, 1935.

I have only the good of the Filipino people at heart. I cannot divest myself of the firm conviction that the Filipinos would be far better off if they had some form of independence under American sovereignty, but it is up to them to say whether or not they wish to go along with us. The decision is theirs to make.

Theodore Roosevelt once said:

"The time will come when it will be wise to take their own judgment as to whether they wish to continue their association with America or not. There is, however, one consideration upon which we should insist. Either we should retain complete control of the islands or absolve ourselves from all responsibility for them. Any half-and-half course would be both foolish and disastrous. We are governing and have been governing the islands in the interest of the Filipinos themselves. If, after due time, the Filipinos themselves decide that they do not wish to be thus governed, then I trust we will leave; but when we do leave it must be distinctly understood that we retain no protectorate over the islands and give them no guaranty of neutrality or otherwise; that, in short, we are absolutely quit with responsibility for them of every kind and description."

President Coolidge, in his letter to Governor General Wood of the Philippine Islands, well stated some of the necessary requisites for self-government by saying:

"The ability of a people to govern themselves is not easily attained. History is filled with failures of popular government; it cannot be learned from books; it is not a matter of eloquent phrases. Liberty, freedom, independence are not mere words the repetition of which brings fulfillment. They demand long, arduous, self-sacrificing preparation. Education, knowledge, experience, sound public opinion, intelligent participation by the great body of the people, high ideals, these things are essential. The degree in which they are possessed determines the capability of a people to govern themselves."

Expressing about the same thought, President Wilson, in appraising our relation with the Philippine people, said:

"But we cannot give them self-government. Self-government is not a thing that can be 'given' to any people, because it is a form of character and not a form of constitution. No people can be 'given' the self-control of maturity. Only a long apprenticeship of obedience can secure them the previous possession, a thing no more to be bought than given. They cannot be presented with the character of a community, but it may confidently be hoped that they will become a community under the wholesome and salutary influences of just laws and a sympathetic administration; that they will after a while understand and master themselves if, in the meantime, they are understood and served in good conscience by those set over them in authority."

It has seemed to me sufficient in the performance of my duty as a member of the special mission to set forth facts concerning the Philippine situation, and state what can be done, for the information and guidance of the Congress, and not attempt to make a recommendation as to what should be done.

It may be well for the Filipinos to consider the dominion form of government with complete independence as to internal affairs under the Commonwealth Government with their own selected chief executive.

They may also consider statehood in a modified form that would give them complete freedom and independence, admitting the Philippines to the Union with two Senators and a limited number of Representatives.

This last plan may involve an amendment to the Constitution. If our 35 years of control and example has not been in vain, they are prepared for such a state; if prepared for independence, as we concede by the enactment of the Tydings-McDuffie Act they are, then they are prepared to be an integral part of the Union, surely better prepared than the Dutch East Indies to be an integral part of the Kingdom of the Netherlands.

Another plan worthy of consideration is for the Filipino people to go forward with the commonwealth government and within the 10-year adjustment period, if they find changes in the political set-up are needed, to apply for a change and cooperate with us in making out the problem to the mutual well-being of both peoples. Another solution worthy of serious consideration is for the Filipinos to proceed indefinitely under a commonwealth government set-up.

But these are only possible solutions, and suggested for what they may be worth.

However, if any recommendation is required in this report, then I suggest that the Filipino people, before the end of the commonwealth period, request a revision of the political as well as the economic features of the Tydings-McDuffie Act, and that America be requested to retain its sovereignty. Small states must rely for their security on a strong nation or enter into intrigues with other small nations, intrigues which endanger the peace of the world. It is increasingly difficult for them to sustain their civil governments against increasing costs.

There could well be a balance of trade by the use of the tariff power, both by this country and by the Philippines, and by nationalizing the shipping between the two markets. If the two people strike an agreement to share American sovereignty, and put off to a remote future the separation arranged for under the Tydings-McDuffie Act, it would, in my opinion, inure to the benefit of both nations. If the Tydings-McDuffie Act is carried out, the small Philippine state will be a disturbing factor in the Far East. In my opinion, it is vital for the Philippines and its resources that our liberal sovereignty should remain, and in this is our own security, for if we abandon them we may become involved in their struggle to survive, and in the struggle that will be precipitated in the Far East.

It is essential, too, it seems to me, that the free institutions set up by America in the Philippine Islands should be continued because the final influence of those institutions would be the general redemption of all Malaysia. This powerful buffet is very important in the future. It will develop slowly, still it will develop surely.

In other words, we should have a state policy in the Far East based on our own democracy, and pursued independently of any other state policy even with the friendliest nations. This is the only safe ground for America in that quarter of the world.

In the event that no political change is made then a trade agreement may be advantageous, both to the United States and to the Philippine Islands, but the road leading to such an agreement is not free from pitfalls.

As previously stated, we have given Cuba exclusive and preferential concessions shared by no other foreign country. Our trade relations with the Philippines are excluded from the Cuba trade agreement of 1934. But it may be argued that the assumption of independent status by the islands would bring the provisions of any trade agreement we may make into conflict with our Cuban agreement. It may be said, too, that any trade agreement, especially with respect to sugar and coconut products, would be unfair to the other sugar- and coconut-producing sections of the world. Then, too, the "most-favored-nation clause" in our 30 commercial treaties provides that the products from a foreign country will receive in the ports of the United States the same treatment as given to the most favored nation.

These difficulties indicate that there must be a full, minute, and complete study made of the whole trade situation; and we should see to it that such a commission is set up immediately to provide the necessary information if we proceed in our relations with the Philippine Islands on the basis of trade agreement alone.

This report should not be construed as a criticism of the Filipino people, or their leaders. They have struggled legitimately to actually realize that which is inherent in every human being, a desire for a greater measure of liberty and freedom and the right to govern themselves.

In addition to the well-being of my own country, my aim is the well-being of the Filipino people; that they may go forward through the years of the future to a safe and secure position among the nations of the world.

They are a gentle, home-loving, hard-working people, who are entitled to protection against the grasping imperialistic nations in the midst of which fate has placed them. America should see her duty clear not to desert them in an hour of danger. I am thinking of the Moros of the south, of the Bontocs and the Igorots of the north, of the man in the rice field, of the farmer and the laborer, and all those who toil long hours for a meager existence. And I join for them in a fervent prayer to God that He may save the Philippine Commonwealth and deliver these people from the fate of falling to the level of the living conditions of the Orient.

ERNEST W. GIBSON.

"CAN THE PARTIES LIVE WITHOUT PATRONAGE?"—ADDRESS BY SENATOR O'MAHONEY

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an address entitled "Can the Parties Live Without Patronage?" delivered by the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] at a dinner of the General Council of the National League of Women Voters in Washington, D. C., on Wednesday, May 8, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The question which has been propounded by your program committee as the subject matter for the discussion this evening admits of a categorical answer and I think it would be asking too much to expect a Democrat, even in a nonpartisan meeting such as this, to overlook the opportunity it affords. The answer is emphatically "yes"; and if you ask for proof, let me point to the fact that the Democratic Party, having elected only three Presidents since the Civil War, has managed to survive without benefit of patronage and to present the country, for good or ill, according to the point of view, with that far-reaching program which is called the "new deal."

Except in the administrations of Grover Cleveland, Woodrow Wilson, and Franklin D. Roosevelt, the Democratic Party has been a stranger to Federal patronage. More than that, I may, perhaps, with propriety, allude to the fact that even though it was a stalwart supporter of Andrew Jackson, who announced that "to the victor belongs the spoils", it was Grover Cleveland who declared that "public office is a public trust", and who took the first steps to use the civil-service law in any measurable degree for the purpose of selecting governmental employees.

The question rather assumes as a major premise, that political parties really exist for the purpose of patronage. If I were to say nothing else tonight, I should want to say that the history of our country proves this to be an assumption without basis. Principles, not patronage, have always constituted the living force of our political system. Those parties which have been uncertain in their philosophy, even though they wielded the power of patronage without restraint, have never been able to preserve themselves from defeat when fundamental issues affecting the public welfare have had to be decided.

PRINCIPLE THE BASIS OF POLITICAL LIFE

Of course, we all recognize that patronage has been abused in all periods of our history; that appointments to office have been made by all parties for no better reason than that the aspirants have rendered, or were believed to have rendered, effective partisan service, and that the hope of reward in the form of public office has frequently been the motive which has prompted ambitious men to align themselves with one party or another. Indeed, many of those who have been candidates for election at the hands of the voters have not been above shaping their course on public questions by what they conceived to be the expedient thing to do. We may admit all of these things. We may acknowledge all of the unlovely phases of political life, and yet it may be said with absolute accuracy that the great majority of our citizens are guided by principle in their political affiliations.

I know of no class of people more ready to depreciate one another than politicians. The other fellows are always rascals—for public consumption. But when you find them gathering around the committee tables, in the legislatures, or in Congress, or conferring on executive boards and commissions, they are never loathe to acknowledge one another's fundamental virtues. The actual truth of the matter is that most of those who hold public office in this country—local, State, or National—are guided by an actual desire to serve the public good. They do not intentionally degrade the offices they hold, nor do they, generally, speaking, pervert the public patronage. Indeed, if the truth were told, I think it would be acknowledged that the standard of ability and integrity in public life is at least as high as it is in private life, and this regardless of the part that patronage is supposed to play.

But the politician, because in his campaign he must needs use the methods of mass appeal, too frequently gives a wrong impression of his calling, and at the same time an exaggerated importance is given to the value of patronage as an instrumentality of politics. Indeed, every executive has found the office seeker the bane of his existence. The wise and effective party leader is not long in discovering that the merit system is not only the best manner in which to secure efficient Government employees, but also the easiest escape from the importunities of the undeserving and the unfit.

The soundness of the merit system as a method of selecting Government employees is, I think, everywhere acknowledged both from the point of view of value in public service and effectiveness of political leadership. Nevertheless, if the selection of all appointive officials were to be exempted from political control, results quite as bad in their effect as those which have been attributed to the spoils system could easily follow.

One thing we must always remember, the Government belongs to the people. It is instituted in their interest. It should be administered in their behalf and not in the interest or in the behalf of the officeholder.

In State or Nation there never yet has been established a bureau which voluntarily limited its own growth. Every board, every commission, that was ever created soon found many reasons, real, plausible, and imaginary, for the expansion of its activities and the perpetuation of its existence.

DANGER OF BUREAUCRACY

Any system that would completely free the civil establishment from the control of political authority would have the inevitable effect of establishing a permanent and oppressive bureaucracy. It is for this reason that I personally look with apprehension upon the movement that would extend the protection of the civil-service laws to all of those who have been given employment in the emergency branches of the present administration. The moment that thousands of employees who were hired for the purpose of doing a particular task which the administration and the country hoped could be accomplished in the briefest possible time, gain the right to feel that they are under the protection of the civil-service laws, in that moment they will begin to feel that they have a vested right to retain permanently the jobs they hold, and in that moment the great task of demobilization of the emergency establishments which should be undertaken just as soon as recovery and reform have been accomplished, will be made 100 times more difficult than it will necessarily be in any event.

One of the perils of a republic is the growth of an officeholding class. It was to escape this danger that some of the earliest American colonists established the principle of rotation in office. Of course, that principle was abused and was made an excuse by which executives in later years justified proscription of all political opponents. The fact that the principle was abused should not, however, close our eyes to its value, because it is one of the best possible means of keeping a government close to the people. In a republic we can afford to sacrifice a good deal of efficiency in order to be sure that we have a government which is responsive to the public will and which will serve the public interest.

It is for this reason that in all steps which we may take for the extension of the merit system in public life we must, above all things, be careful to preserve in the executive authority the right to appoint and remove at will all principal public officials who play a part in framing political policy. Only those officers whose duties are purely ministerial should be made secure in their tenure. If the people are to maintain control of their government, they must have leaders who may be appointed as well as elected to important public places.

When, as at the Presidential election of 1932, the voters of the Nation said in the most emphatic way in which it could be said, that they wanted a change in the management of the Government, they were entitled to have that change not only in the person of the President and the Vice President and of those Senators and Representatives who were elected in the several States, but they were entitled to have as thorough-going a change of supervision in all so-called "key positions" of the executive arm as might be necessary to bring about the altered point of view, without which the altered objectives for which they declared could not be obtained. This statement would remain just as true if at the next Presidential election there should be another reversal of opinion by the people. They are the sovereigns. Their will is the law of the land, and we should be very careful to do nothing which would set up an obstacle to prevent the effectuation of that will.

PEOPLE MUST CONTROL EXECUTIVE ARM OF GOVERNMENT

It is not only true that the man who takes the sword of political combat should be willing to perish by that sword if the tide of battle runs against him, but it is also true that the officeholder who desires to hold his place permanently in the public service must be willing to forego not only active participation in political campaigns, but he must also be willing to forego the exercise of directing influence in shaping the policies of his Government. Only the people have the right to do that through agents whom they may change at will.

When any new President is elected it becomes not only his right, but his duty, to make effective the public policies for which he stands. If he should be surrounded by a permanent officeholding class in every department of the Government, in every commission, in every board, in every bureau, it is not difficult to see that his efforts would be certain to be rendered futile.

The magnitude of the Government establishment exceeds by far anything that the average citizen has ever imagined. In single office buildings in Washington there are more clerks and Government employees than there are inhabitants in many a substantial town throughout the land. It is a common experience for a Senator or Representative receiving a call from some constituent who is visiting Washington for the first time to hear that constituent say, "Why when I wrote and asked you to see the Secretary of the Interior, to call upon the Collector of Internal Revenue, or to go to the Veterans' Bureau (or some other department chief as the case might be), I had a picture of you putting on your hat and walking across the street to another building. It never occurred to me that the city was filled with Government offices larger than factories."

In circumstances like these it is perfectly obvious that when the work of the various branches is necessarily delegated to subordinates who wield great power, though their names are never heard outside of their own departments, it is a physical impossibility for the President and his Cabinet officers to direct the policy of the departments without the active, responsible, and loyal cooperation of the men who hold the key places. The President and his Cabinet aides are necessarily dependent upon these officials. Place them in office permanently, subject to removal only for cause, and you shackle the hands of your President and deprive the people of their right to exert a direct control through their Chief Executive upon the Government.

Members of Congress are elected to represent the people and the States in the enactment of the laws. They hold no executive power. The President is the only official elected to represent all the people and to act for them in an executive capacity. All the vast multitude of appointees also represent all the people, but they are not elected. They are not responsive to the people. The people know nothing of what they are doing or how they are doing it. It becomes essential, therefore, if we are to preserve the fundamental theory that ours is a government of the people, that the President must be protected in exercising complete authority over every official who has the power and the duty to direct policy.

REFORMS NOW RIFE FOR ADOPTION

This can be accomplished without in any degree impeding the advance of the merit system. Indeed, one of the three major reforms which it seems to me are ripe for adoption in the civil-service system, is a practical plan for the transfer or reassignment of civil servants in the upper bracket to other duties in the same or in different departments without loss of rating. Under the present system if a department head desires to make a change among subordinate superintendents, it is ordinarily necessary to cause demotions of salary to an extent that does not seem to be justified in the absence of delinquency on the part of the official.

Another reform which would seem to be a natural development would be a prohibition against the covering into the civil service either by Executive order or by legislative enactment of either individual employees or classes of employees originally appointed without regard to the civil-service laws.

A third reform, which I venture to hope is almost at hand, is the extension of the system to the appointment of all postmasters. These are officials who clearly have no functions to perform in the delineation of policy. Moreover, they are not concentrated at the seat of government, but are scattered throughout the Nation where they are constantly under the observation of the people whom they serve. When it becomes clear that postmasters are actually selected and appointed because of their capacity to perform the particular task to which they are assigned, public faith in the civil-service system will be vastly increased.

All three of these reforms restricting partisanship in the selection of employees, but not impairing the essential political control of the executive arm of the Government, will be, in my opinion, just as beneficial to the political parties as they surely will be to the public service, for again let me say it is not by patronage but by principle that a political party prospers.

WOMEN IN INDUSTRY—ADDRESS BY SENATOR WAGNER

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able address delivered by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] on the occasion of the public-affairs dinner of the Institute of Women's Professional Relations at the Hotel Astor, New York City, on March 28, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

An enduring civilization has been reared on this continent by the mutual endeavors of men and women working together. The white man began to take root in the New World, not when the earliest explorers crossed the ocean in search of gold or adventure, but when more solid folk brought their wives to the rocky New England coast and built their homes as adjuncts to their farms. Two hundred years later, when a growing population began to surge toward the Pacific, it was not the daring and unstable prospector who conquered the West. The West was captured by the covered wagon, bearing women as dauntless, as sturdy, and as industrious as their men. Throughout our history it has been the same. During the last century our agricultural wealth was due in large part to the woman at work in her home, spinning, sewing, preserving, caring for her children, and even assisting her husband in the more arduous tasks of the great outdoors. The tremendous role that the woman of today plays in our economic life is neither a new nor a passing phase. It is as old as America itself.

The emergency of women into industrial and professional work divorced from the home is novel only because the swelling tide of our industrial development is itself new. The woman's security today depends upon the job rather than upon the welfare of a tight little domestic economy, because we are passing from a Nation of farmers to a Nation of jobholders. In almost every nook and cranny explored by enterprise will be found a part of the 10,000,000 women who are working for pay. While those in the factories are concentrated largely in textiles and clothing, they are not absent even from the packing house or the automobile plant. Over half a million are saleswomen, in clerical occupations. They are as numerous as men, and they have established their preeminence as instructors of the young. The volume of women in professional life increased 48 percent between 1920 and 1930, and has now risen to about 1,400,000, placing them almost on a level with men in this respect. In quality as in quantity they do not suffer by comparison. Ranking in the top flight of authors, explorers, aviators, dramatists, lawyers, judges, professors, and college presidents, women are now distinguishing also the highest positions in our governmental life.

Caught in the whirl of industrialism, women are faced, as mothers, as job holders, or as both, with every acute economic problem now confronting the world. In addition, they are burdened with a long train of handicaps artificially imposed upon them because of their womanhood, and it is to these that I wish to devote a few remarks.

The discrimination confronting the job-holding woman today is the lineal descendant of the ugly prejudice which only a century ago forced Mary Ann Evans to write her extraordinary novel under the name of George Elliot, and which within our own memories was extending the ballot to the man alone. Happily these coarser and more obvious forms of stupidity and injustice have faded into the background.

But feeding upon prejudices more difficult to eradicate, more difficult even to see, have been the forces of economic exploitation, preying upon women in industry by classifying them as undeserving of equal treatment with men.

Because wages are at the center of business, relatively low pay is the signal badge of inequality that women have worn. One hundred years ago they received only one-fourth as much as men performing similar work. While such glaring disparities have vanished, the necessary leveling process is not yet completed, and discrimination is rife in many areas. Nor is this disfavor confined to wages. When the depression set in women lost their jobs first, and in short order over 2,000,000 of them were reduced to dependency. Stepchildren of industry in times of sunshine, they became the first orphans of the storm.

As all evils, the one to which I have referred has been prolific in self-justification. It has been said that the majority of women are unskilled workers. This is less true today than formerly, for women are entering every field of skilled and technical endeavor. And even where it is true, the apology falls to the ground because equally unskilled men receive better wages.

Another common misstatement is that women can afford to earn less because they are merely marginal workers for whom their jobs are a means of supplementing a family income. Of course, this neglects entirely the unmarried, independent women, who constitute over 70 percent of all those in industry at the present time. To these single people the job is life itself. Frequently they have parents or other dependents to care for. They are faced with the constant threat of insecurity in the future, of sickness and unemployment. In every respect their working problem is as large as that of the man.

Nor is the argument of the marginal producer validly applicable to the married women. When she enters the economic world the contribution of her family to the wealth of the Nation is approximately twice as great as when her husband alone was working. This means that the family income should be doubled, not that husband and wife should be forced to share the earnings which previously had accrued to him alone. Aside from the economic injustice of any other course, there is the paramount social interest to be weighed. In view of the low incomes of the vast majority of American families, the working woman is forced into industry to extend the opportunities, at times even to preserve the very health, of her children. Her stake in her job is not a trivial one.

We have tragic and cumulative evidence of the effect of low wages upon the health and welfare of women in industry. In 1932 their Nation-wide average weekly earnings were $11.72. It is conservatively estimated that of this meager sum $11.63 would be required for a decent level of board and lodging. This would leave practically nothing for clothes, for health, for insurance, for recreation, and for the other benefits which enter into a full life.

An equal stake in her job with men is necessary to give substance to the form of political and social emancipation which the woman now enjoys. We live in a great industrial civilization, where all of our habits and institutions are colored and shaped by the conditions prevailing in our economic life. So long as woman is discriminated against in industry, her political liberation will be an illusory blessing and her social equality a meaningless slogan.

Contrary to the impression of the short-sighted discrimination against women in industry is equally pernicious in its effect upon men who work. This is quite platitudinous in regard to the married woman who is bearing her share of the breadwinning task. And while only 15.9 percent of the women at work were married in 1890, the number rose to 28.9 percent in 1930.

Secondly, the existence of a vast army of underpaid women who are regarded as cheap material for the labor market exercises a depressive effect upon all wage rates. Nothing could be more mistaken than the notion that women would compete with men if they were treated on an equal footing. Hurtful competition exists just because they have not been put upon an equal footing, and because lower standards always tend to drag all down to their own level.

The most important reason why higher wages for women would benefit the entire industrial system, however, is that they would increase the total volume of purchasing power and thus maintain the consumer demand upon which stability and progress depend. The lag in wages that constituted the most powerful depression-producing force was in large measure assignable to the direct and indirect effects of discriminatory practices in industry.

Until the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act, there was little legislative embodiment of a principle of equality against which no sound argument can be directed. But in over three-fourths of the 400 codes under that act the same basic wages are provided for women as for men. And, as clear thinking and education drive home the realization that the interests of men and women in industry are unified rather than in conflict, the pace of progress for both will be quickened.

Up to the present, most of the legislation designed to protect women at their jobs, instead of dealing with the problem of discrimination, has given women certain preferences based upon their special characteristics in strength and endurance. Thus, only five States have failed to pass laws regulating the hours of work for women in factories. Some sincere advocates of the cause of women in industry have looked with disfavor upon this special legislation upon the theory that it denies the principle of equal treatment. While I appreciate their sentiments, I do not share their views. There does not seem to me to be any inconsistency in holding on the one hand that women should receive equal treatment with men for the same kind of work, and on the other hand that women should receive special consideration based upon special circumstances. I am inclined to agree with the famous statement of Mr. Justice Holmes dissenting from a Supreme Court decision which declared unconstitutional a minimum-wage law for women in the District of Columbia. He said: "It will need more than the nineteenth amendment to convince me that there are no differences between men and women, or that legislation cannot take those differences into account."

The most important reason, however, for upholding and enlarging these special laws which advance women in industry, is that they are the entering wedge through which can be driven new and wider forms of social security laws for all groups. It was upon the experience established by regulating the work of women and children that the National Recovery Act was reared to guard the living standards of all groups. It is to the precedents of liberal courts sustaining special protective legislation that we look when we hope to sustain general protective legislation. Progress comes by slow degrees, and every assumption of social responsibility, however slight, is a step in the direction of that public enlightenment upon which full responsibility must rest.

While women have been most active in the advocacy of welfare legislation, they have, on the whole, not kept pace with men in self-organization, or in cooperative efforts based upon trade or industrial or professional unity. But our experiences during the past 2 years have confirmed my opinion that no government alone can do the entire job of recovery or reform. The minimum standards set by law are merely the base upon which individuals and groups must build by their own efforts. And even the basic adequacy or inadequacy of these minimum standards depends largely upon the alertness and articulateness of those to whom they apply. For these reasons I have been glad to observe recently the quickening impulse toward the association of women of similar interests in leagues, in unions, in welfare societies, and in other similar agencies. These smaller units of government and self-expression are the guardians of democracy in a machine age which threatens to impersonalize us all.

Job security and fair treatment upon the job must take precedence over any attempts to minister to those who are unemployed or destitute because of old age. The phenomenal must not be served at the expense of the commonplace. Therefore it might seem at first glance that the present plans for unemployment and old-age insurance which are now being pushed to a conclusion in Washington are of secondary importance. But this is not so, because the essential feature of these plans is the salutary effect they will have upon job security through the stabilization of industry.

Old-age insurance, by removing from the labor market the older and less efficient workers, will create new openings for the young and the strong who are clamoring for employment. And to all those who are now at work it will add a sense of security deriving from an outlook into the future untouched by the fear of dependency. Unemployment insurance will intensify our efforts to remove the costly curse of unemployment itself. The payment of benefits to those who are old or jobless will spread purchasing power and thus modulate, if not remove, the downward drive of the business cycle. Thus while these different proposals for social security march along different avenues of approach, they are all converging upon the key citadel of job security itself.

Another important aspect of job security is the growing consciousness on the part of government that, while it must do everything possible to stimulate private industry, it must provide work insofar as it cannot be found elsewhere. In fact, it seems to me that the outstanding accomplishment of the past few years has been our recognition that the rockbottom responsibility for giving everyone an opportunity to earn a living rests not with charity or with private individuals but with the State as the embodiment of the public conscience and the public will.

In our public-works programs women present a special problem, because they do not fit as well as men into the more traditional types of governmental projects, such as road building, forestry, and harbor improvements. But under the civil works of last year a wide range of useful activities were explored that were adapted to the inclinations of women in general, as well as to the white-collared and professional classes at large. I am sure that with our growing knowledge these considerations will exercise an even greater influence in the future.

It is a shallow outlook that attributes women's increasing participation in government and reform solely to her new position in our industrial life. The guiding spirit of today is not the cold logic of economics, but the warm humanitarianism of social justice. And it is this latter quality which has always made women leading campaigners against the sweatshop and the slums, against the exploitation of the child and the degradation of the fully grown, against the whole train of miseries that poverty drags in its wake. As women rise in civil and political life, just so surely will the present dawn of a better day rise to the high noon of accomplishment.

"MISREPRESENTING THE BANKING BILL"—EDITORIAL BY RAYMOND MOLEY

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial by Raymond Moley, appearing in Today for May 11, 1935, entitled "Misrepresenting the Banking Bill."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There has been no shortage of loose talk by opponents of the banking bill commended by Mr. Roosevelt in his radio address on April 28. Twice during the past week I have been told by intelligent leaders of public opinion—great editors, both of them—that they were doubtful about the Eccles amendments, because, perforce, these amendments would set up 48 political members as a central bank board and thus subject the banking system of the country to the vagaries of a political body. The fact is that these men were not talking about title II of Governor Eccles' proposed amendments but of a totally different bill, the Nye-Sweeney bill. But they thought they were talking about the proposals of Governor Eccles. They had been completely confused by the outcries of many supposedly reputable leaders of public opinion to the effect that the Eccles amendments proposed to make the Federal Reserve Board wholly "political."

Let us look at the facts and see whether the inference is justified. Governor Eccles' proposals do not change the essential nature of the Federal Reserve Board. Under his proposals the Federal Reserve Board will still consist of 8 members, 6 of whom will be appointed by the President for 12-year terms, just as they have always been. The two others, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, will be ex officio. These officials now are and have been members of the Board. The amendments provide for an increase in the compensation of the appointed members to a sum equal to that of Cabinet officers. This provision is intended to give them more security and more financial independence, which everyone will grant is a necessary condition of such important service.

There are two changes in the conditions under which these offices will be held. The first provides for the retirement of members of the Board when they reach the age of 70, and gives them a pension. This certainly is not revolutionary. The other change provides that the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board shall be designated as such by the President, but that when the President terminates his designation of Governor, he shall cease to be a member of the Board. This gives the Governor of the Board the same basis of tenure as that of a Cabinet member, which makes him responsible to the President. But it does not give the President control of the Board. The other five members of the Board continue to hold office regardless of changes in the administration in Washington. They will serve out their terms of 12 years each. Present members will not be subject to the 70-year retirement rule. No President, under these conditions, can change the Board at his discretion.

The Eccles amendments, therefore, do not subordinate the Board to any President. It remains an independent public agency. To call an agency that is public by the term "political" is merely a means of confusing the real issue. The real issue is the power the amendments would give to the Federal Reserve Board to direct more effectively than it now can the credit policy of the United States. The opponents of the bill apparently would perpetuate a stalemate between private and public credit control.

The purpose of the Federal Reserve Board is and has always been the substitution of public for private control of credit in the United States. The people of this country have experienced the effects of private control and they have refused to tolerate its continuation. That matter is a closed issue. It was closed by the terms of the Federal Reserve Act itself and by President Wilson's repeated assurances to the people that the act was intended to put an end to private control.

The Eccles amendments are designed to make public control of credit more effective. If it is this purpose that the opponents of the bill are fighting, the people of this country have a right to know it. That issue can be fought on its merits. But it is unjust and unfair to attempt to obscure it by a false and alarming cry of "politics."

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial which appeared in yesterday's Washington Times entitled "Pay the Cash Bonus Now."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times of Wednesday, May 8, 1935]

PAY CASH BONUS NOW

There can be no doubt that this country wants to pay the soldiers' bonus, and pay it now in cash.

The overwhelming vote for the Patman bill in the Senate yesterday expresses the feeling of the United States. After having had every sort of scare and argument thrown in its face, Congress has refused to be stampeded. Congress is determined that the veterans who fought the World War should be compensated.

The tremendous bonuses paid to some of the bomb-proof munitions makers have had deep influence in rallying this country to an appreciation of the fact that the boys in blue and olive drab have something coming to them.

Two attempts have been made in this Congress to pay the bonus without putting out any money. These hocus-pocus attempts at financial legerdemain have been thrown into the scrap heap.

One was the Vinson bill to pay the bonus now with Government I O U bonds that would have eventually overloaded the Treasury with interest debt; the other was the vague bill of Senator PAT HARRISON, which never had a chance.

Its quick defeat in the Senate simply accentuates the fact that the people are tired of temporizing with the situation and want the bonus paid now and are willing to pay it in money.

President Roosevelt's attitude indicates he will veto the Patman bill. He will bring every influence to bear on just a few Senators whose slender votes to uphold his veto would kill the bonus for another session, at least.

President Roosevelt's attitude will not represent the country at large. Congress, particularly the Senate, is to be congratulated on the passage of the Patman bonus bill.

We believe the House will override a veto; we trust sincerely that the Senate will take itself in hand and settle the bonus question once and for all time.

"COURT PROBLEMS"—ARTICLE BY JUSTICE FRANCIS MARTIN

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a very informative address by Mr. Justice Francis Martin, the presiding judge, appellate division, first department of the New York Supreme Court, which relates to the subject of Court Problems. I think the article is of general interest, and I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Every time we find an abuse we immediately try to correct it by new laws, very often not well considered and frequently suggested by people unfit to advise. That may be a proper solution in a few instances.

The real solution is in placing the right men in office, especially in judicial office. All the laws you can place on the statute books will not make a good judge out of a poor one. Competent judges do their work well in any court.

Our great difficulty is in the personnel of the judiciary. Appoint or elect good men to any court, and you will have no difficulty with that court. Take the magistrates' court, for example. You now have some very fine judges in the magistrates' court, and a few very poor judges. The few poor ones bring criticism on the whole court.

Much of the criticism of the magistrates' court is very unjust and very unfair.

A short time ago we had several outbreaks in that court by lawyers who should know that such a course is certain to result in injury to the reputation of the court, and particularly to their own reputations. A bill was prepared and sent to Albany to permit the magistrates to immediately commit for contempt anyone guilty of a disorderly outbreak in the courtroom.

Some of our very learned legislators, who could never hope to be the equal of most of our magistrates in character, learning, and integrity, criticized the bill and defeated it in the face of the fact that all of the bar associations and courts favored giving the magistrates an opportunity to keep order in the courts.

Some of these legislators seem to think that they are sent to Albany to oppose any measure that is in the interest of the people.

The right to punish for contempt has been given to practically every other court in the State, even to justices of the peace, and yet it was refused to the magistrates' court because one or two of the magistrates were considered unworthy of such power.

The right to punish for contempt has been in most of the courts as long as the courts have existed in this country. It has never been abused. If abused, the action of the judge may be reviewed on appeal. Anyone held in contempt of court is fully protected under our system of laws. Of course, that may be information for some of our legislators.

We are constantly reminded of the fact that the calendars are crowded.

Every time we hear that subject somebody suggests more judges. Remember, the law's delay has been the subject of debate for generations. When you consider the number of tort cases commenced each year you will realize that if they were to be tried all the judges in the State of New York would not be able to dispose of these cases.

Many of them are never brought to trial. There never was any intention to ask for a trial. They have a nuisance value only. There are thousands of cases without any merit brought each year. If we had to deal only with meritorious cases we would have no difficulty in disposing of all the litigation.

I assure you this whole matter will be remedied. We have not been able to remedy all these abuses in a couple of months. We have been able in a few months to accomplish a number of important improvements in the courts and many more, we hope, will follow.

AIR BASES ALONG THE CANADIAN BORDER

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the entire Nation was shocked and, to put it bluntly, indignant and disgusted, when it was divulged a short time ago that Army officers had planned "camouflaged air bases" along the Canadian border. These were to be camouflaged so as not to alarm the people of Canada.

It has been our proud boast for years that we have thousands of miles of border to the north on which it was not necessary to have forces and fortifications. Two great Nations in this New World have lived together in peace for more than a century. Preparedness for war between these two Nations was not necessary.

In fact, preparedness against Canada, or preparedness by Canada against the United States, would have been regarded as a species of jingoistic insanity. Frankly, the people of this continent did not even suspect that our own Army officers were guilty of that species of insanity.

Then we learn that our Army headquarters has been plotting to get around the treaty of 1818 with Canada, and making plans that could not result in anything else but the displeasure of a peaceful neighbor. Is it any wonder that nations engage in foolish and wicked wars?

Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD, at the conclusion of these brief remarks the following editorials from newspapers of different sections of the United States, showing the reaction of the public mind to these wild schemes:

The New York Herald Tribune, which calls it "a disgracefully stupid piece of business", and approves President Roosevelt's stinging rebuke.

The Kansas City Star, which notes that the plans—

Assumed that the United States has no regard for international law.

The Washington News, which comments that—

A permanent Canadian-American peace alliance is worth more in actual defense and safety of this Nation than the United States Army, Navy, and Air Corps combined, and all the billions of dollars spent on preparedness.

The Washington Post, which sees that—

If such scheming, academic though it may be, is consistent with being a good neighbor, then words have no meaning.

The Newark Evening News points out that—

Again the ranking generals of the Army are trying to run away with the country, and Congress is burning up with a fever.

The New York Post labels it a—

Vicious Army plan to build an air base near the Canadian border.

I find that these editorials are typical of hundreds of others printed by newspapers of all political faiths and published in every State in the Union. I know of no newspaper anywhere in this country that has expressed anything but disapproval.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorials be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune]

A WELL-MERITED REBUKE

The President, by the promptness and vigor with which he has repudiated the supposedly secret testimony of Generals Kilbourne and Andrews before the House Military Affairs Committee, has done what he can to minimize the harm that might flow from a disgracefully stupid piece of business. It was careless stupidity which allowed the testimony to become public, and the chairman of the committee deserves the Presidential rebuke administered to him. This is true because military committees in all nations are constantly dealing with hypothetical contingencies involving friendly powers; they are bound to hear testimony that would not look well in headlines and they cannot properly discharge their function unless they can guarantee that confidential matters will be kept in confidence. It is the duty of high Army officers to study every possible eventuality. Speculations like those of General Andrews concerning the British and French islands off our coasts are commonplaces in every war office in the world; they are of no particular consequence, but they are bound to crop up in discussions of military policy, and our military men are entitled to the protection of secrecy when they do.

But if the committee was stupid, General Kilbourne was considerably more so when he allowed himself to say, even in an executive session, that he had prepared a bill for a military air base on the Canadian border "camouflaged" as an "intermediate station for transcontinental flights." The undefended Canadian border is a fundamental and long-established element in American foreign policy, and when an Army officer sets out to circumvent it by preparing "camouflaged" bills—when he even permits himself to think in such terms—he is departing from his proper functions in a wholly inadmissible fashion. European, and more recently Japanese, history is studded with horrible examples of what happens when military men begin to govern foreign policy in accordance with narrow technical concepts of strategy. Fortunately, the United States, of all major powers, is probably least open to the charge of military domination of its civil policy, but this only makes more necessary the emphatic suppression of any nascent tendencies in that direction. If the United States ever decides to begin fortifying her northern border, she will not do it through measures "camouflaged" even from her own people. The President's letter is a stinging rebuke to General Kilbourne, but the general brought it on himself.

[From the Kansas City Star]

GENERALS OUT OF TURN

The President was thoroughly justified in the rebuke he administered to two high ranking officers of the United States Army for their testimony before the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives concerning plans and policies for national defense. The suggestion of Brig. Gen. F. M. Andrews that this country might have to seize Newfoundland, Bermuda, and other British possessions off the Atlantic seaboard, to prevent their falling into the hands of some hypothetical enemy and being used as bases for attack, involved a gratuitous threat to a friendly power. Moreover, it was a threat which assumed that the United States has no regard for international law.

The testimony of Brig. Gen. C. E. Kilbourne was, if anything, even more outrageous. It disclosed that the War Department in a pending bill had inserted a "camouflaged" provision for a powerful air base near the Canadian border, thereby directly violating one of our fundamental defense traditions that the boundary between the United States and Canada should be completely unfortified.

Both of these propositions invade the realm of national policy, concerning which neither individual officers nor the War Department officials are qualified to speak, and it is useful that the President, in his capacity as commander in chief of all the armed forces of the United States, has repudiated them. The testimony, of course, should never have been published. But, what is more important, it should never have been given.

[From the Washington Post]

THE GOOD NEIGHBOR?

Hypocrisy is the one unpardonable blunder in the conduct of foreign policy. It is unpardonable, because always easy to detect, and because, when detected, hypocrisy invariably arouses legitimate suspicions in other nations. Thereafter foreign mistrust is only strengthened by soothing proclamations and further protestations of good will.

Unfortunately, hypocrisy is the only description applicable when it is revealed that while the President of the United States is emphasizing a "good neighbor" policy his military subordinates are working out plans to build air bases against Canada and to seize adjacent British and French territory "in time of emergency." If such scheming, academic though it may be, is consistent with being a good neighbor, then words have no meaning.

Because of their implicit contradiction of his reiterated pronouncements, and because of his direct responsibility as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, President Roosevelt could do nothing less than publicly disown statements made by General Andrews and General Kilbourne before executive sessions of the House Committee on Military Affairs. Chairman McSWAIN, of that committee, has taken personal responsibility for the blunder of making that testimony public. But this does not explain why national policy should encourage high officers of the United States to spend public funds in planning activities which would be in direct violation of the spirit and letter of treaty obligations solemnly and voluntarily undertaken by the Government of the United States.

Since the issue has been so sensationally raised, it may be hoped that the underlying moral will be seriously taken to heart. It is a matter of common knowledge that the Department of State now has less final authority in matters of foreign policy and that military spokesmen have more influence in this field than at any previous period of our peace-time history. For a country with the traditions of the United States, that is an unprecedented and highly disquieting trend. Representative McSWAIN has really done a national service by making it clear that our own militarists need the application of controls by the presumably supreme civil authority.

[From the Washington News]

AN APOLOGY TO CANADA

One of the most serious diplomatic blunders ever made in this or any other administration has just occurred. The testimony of high Army officers to a House committee regarding alleged United States war plans has frightened Canadians and caused official representations by the Ottawa Government to Washington. Although President Roosevelt has been quick to disavow the Army testimony, further friendly action will be required to repair the damage.

This is an exceedingly serious matter for many reasons. It arouses suspicion in the mind of our oldest and best friend—perhaps our only unqualified friend among all the large nations of the world. It appears to violate the spirit of our treaty with our neighbor. It reveals a dangerous trend of our military men to usurp the policy-making function of the civil government.

Brigadier General Kilbourne, until recently Assistant Chief of Staff in charge of war plans, explained to the committee how he camouflaged the Wilcox bill to provide a giant air base near the Canadian border. "I could not put it in the bill because of the Canadian situation," he said. "You will notice no. 7 in my bill is camouflaged. It is called 'intermediate stations for transcontinental flight', but it means the same thing."

Brigadier General Andrews, Chief of the new General Headquarters Air Force, added fuel by testifying that, even with Canada neutral, the United States in war might seize Newfoundland and British and French islands in the Atlantic and Caribbean: "If the situation is sufficiently vital to require it, we must be prepared to seize these outlying bases to prevent their development by the enemy as bases of operations against us."

The President, in stating that this Kilbourne and Andrews testimony on war plans "does not represent either the policy of this administration or that of the Commander in Chief", reaffirmed our traditional treaty policy with Canada as follows:

"I call your especial attention to the fact that this Government not only accepts as an accomplished fact the permanent peace conditions cemented by many generations of friendship between the Canadian and American people, but expects to live up to not only the letter but the spirit of our treaties relating to the permanent disarmament of our 3,000 miles of common boundary."

We trust our Canadian friends will accept this assurance by the President and Commander in Chief as representing not only the policy of the Washington Government but of the American people. The easy and often inaccurate phrase about war being "unthinkable" happens to be 100 percent true in the case of the United States and Canada.

As for our militarists, the Commander in Chief presumably will find occasion to teach them two very simple facts at least. The first is that attempted military usurpation of civil government power is one of the most heinous offenses in this Republic. The second is that a permanent Canadian-American peace alliance is worth more in the actual defense and safety of this Nation than the United States Army, Navy, and Air Corps combined and all the billions of dollars spent on preparedness.

No nation in the world is so blessed as ours with the natural protection of two oceans and a neighbor like Canada. We jeopardize Canadian friendship at our peril.

[From the Newark Evening News of Wednesday, May 1, 1935]

SHAMEFUL

Again the ranking generals of the Army are trying to run away with the country, and a Congress afflicted with investigationitis is burning up with a fever. President Roosevelt has hauled them both up with a round turn, and they deserved it.

Injudicious Army officers have talked too much and indiscreetly. The confusion in world affairs has given them an opportunity to talk strong, and they have said things to the House Military Affairs Committee that never should have been said. The House committee should have had sense enough to keep these things from publication. It has disturbed our closest neighbor by revealing the War Department planned an Army airplane base near the Canadian border, which has been unfortified for more than a century. It is shameful for us to be in a position where Canada has the right to call on us to explain.

The country should go sled length with the President in demanding that these indiscretions be stopped and in warning Army officers that if they can't use more discretion, they will not be allowed to talk until the President has O. K'd their speeches.

[From the New York Post]

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE MUST RUN THEIR ARMY

The Nation's thanks go out to Franklin D. Roosevelt for his prompt action in scotching the vicious Army plan to build an air base near the Canadian border.

The marplots on the General Staff were quite ready to blow up the 100-year tradition of unguarded frontiers between the two Nations in order to have one more air base that they didn't need.

They would have started a mad arms race between two countries whose friendship is one of the very few glories of modern international relations. They would have brought the European border of steel and iron to the New World that neither wants nor needs such insanities.

Let the War Department take the rebuke to heart. Not only their President, but their Commander in Chief, has spoken to them. The Roosevelt administration will not be the one to destroy friendship with our neighbor on the north.

And let one important point be noted by the American people: It is the great blessing of our democratic system that the Commander in Chief of the American Army and Navy is elected directly by the people.

Our Army does not rule the people; the people rule the Army. Our military policy is framed by our elected President, responsive to the wishes of the citizens.

How important that is can be realized by a glance at almost any European country where a military caste indoctrinated with the peculiar notions of its trade leads its people on to periodic blood baths as its own sweet will determines.

Our Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy comes, as a civilian, from the people. He knows what they want. Such traditions as our unguarded Canadian frontier mean to him what they do to the rest of us—and not what they mean to swivel-chair generals, constantly seeking to expand their machine in order to increase their own importance.

The poison of militarism may affect our General Staff. General Kilbourne's asinities show that it does. But we shall be safe so long as we, as voters, elect the chief of our military—and keep a watchful eye on its activities.

An especially watchful eye since the Canadian air-base incident has revealed what is going on in the minds of the War College.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. NORRIS to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2357) to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2357, proposing to amend what is commonly known as the "Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933."

When the Senate recessed last night we were undertaking to specify the various abuses of authority under the Tennessee Valley Authority Act as bearing upon the nature of the issue presented by the bill which it is now sought to have considered by the Senate, in an effort to show that it is important and not trivial, and that a bill of this character and effect ought not to be considered by the Senate until after it shall have been considered by a standing committee of the Senate, hearings shall have been held, testimony taken, and an adequate report submitted to the Senate.

I now continue the recital of specifications by referring again to extracts from an audit of the Tennessee Valley Authority by the Comptroller General of the United States. It should be borne in mind that what is taking place here is a recounting of history, a statement of facts, a statement of experience, for the purpose of exciting an interest on the part of Senators in having the bill in question properly studied before it is considered on the floor of the Senate.

An extract from the audit at page 20 involves sundry items where contracts were awarded to others than the lowest bidder. In one group there were 26 items, totaling $15,487.91, the largest item being $4,050, Blaw-Knox Co. Of course, the audit is in detail, but it could not be included in an address to the Senate upon the subject; yet the Senate should have that detail. It should be before a committee of the Senate and carefully considered before the Senate enters upon the consideration of the bill.

In November 1933 a contract was awarded to the Bucyrus-Erie Shovel Co. for electric shovels at $35,990.50, whereas the lowest bidder was the Link Belt Co.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GIBSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. LONG. It is a little bit out of order, but something has just been told me that I want my friend the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to know, because he has been compiling some statistics. I wish to state that a friend of mine from Texas, a legal opponent of mine in a good deal of litigation in rate matters, has told me that three shiploads of cottonseed oil, made in Germany, were sold in Houston, Tex., this past year. I thought my friend from Tennessee might be glad to have that news.

Mr. McKELLAR. Made from German cotton?

Mr. LONG. Probably made from Russian cotton.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wonder how much cotton the Senator from Louisiana raises in Germany.

Mr. LONG. I raise none in Germany. I never have raised any in Louisiana when I could help it. However, I know something about cotton.

Mr. AUSTIN. In November 1933 a contract was awarded the Marion Steam Shovel Co. for a rebuilt gasoline-driven shovel at $8,000, whereas the Thew Shovel Co. was the low bidder at $6,000 and $7,000. Taking the evidence in the light most favorable to the Authority, there was an excess paid over the low bid of $1,000 for that shovel.

December 1933, contract with Marion Steam Shovel Co. for a rebuilt shovel at $9,000; low bidder, Equipment Corporation, at $3,500. In that case there was an excess over the low bid paid for this shovel of $5,000.

At this point it seems appropriate to put in the RECORD the statute on this subject. It is brief, and I shall read it. I now read section 5 of title 41, public contracts:

Advertisements for proposals for purchases and contracts for supplies of service departments of Government: Except as otherwise provided by law, all purchases and contracts for supplies or services in any of the departments of the Government and purchases of Indian supplies, except for personal services, shall be made by advertising a sufficient time previously for proposals respecting the same, when the public exigencies do not require immediate delivery of the articles or performance of the service. When immediate delivery or performance is required by the public exigency, the articles or service required may be procured by open purchase or contract, at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold, or such services engaged, between individuals.

I now read section 529 of title 31 of the United States Code, which is applicable to the same subject:

Advances of public moneys; prohibition against: Except as otherwise provided by law, no advance of public money shall be made in any case. And in all cases of contracts for the performance of any service, or the delivery of articles of any description, for the use of the United States, payment shall not exceed the value of the service rendered, or of the articles delivered previously to such payments. It shall, however, be lawful, under the special direction of the President, to make such advances to the disbursing officers of the Government as may be necessary to the faithful and prompt discharge of their respective duties, and to the fulfillment of the public engagements. The President may also direct such advances as he may deem necessary and proper to persons in the military and naval service employed on distant stations where the discharge of the pay and emoluments to which they may be entitled cannot be regularly effected.

Mr. President, Congress enacted these statutes in order to safeguard the Treasury of the United States. Congress enacted these statutes to protect the taxes gathered from the American people against overpayment, against excess payment, against the awarding of contracts at a higher price or consideration than an open competitive bid established by determining the lowest price at which a responsible bidder would either perform the service or transfer the property.

That is the law of the land; and these specifications being now set forth of acts by the Tennessee Valley Authority in respect to purchases and contracts are presented at this time for the purpose of showing the importance of the Senate acting only after deliberation upon this bill, which extends the power and the Tennessee Valley Authority and increases the amount of money which it shall have in the future.

In December 1933 a contract was awarded to the Marion Steam Shovel Co. for an electric shovel at $37,240, notwithstanding there were three lower bids, as follows:

Bucyrus-Erie Co.
Harnespharger Co.
Link Belt Co.

In January 1935 the Bucyrus-Erie Co. was awarded a contract for an electric shovel at $35,745.50, whereas the low bidder was the Link Belt Co.

In April and May 1934 orders for 13 items of transformers were placed with others than low bidders, and these items totaled $25,293.34. The audit gives the specific items. They are not reproduced here in the interest of saving the time of the Senate.

Another example: A contract was given to the White Motor Co. for a White truck at $8,155.90, there being 6 bids for the truck, of which 5 were lower than the White Co.'s bid.

In March 1934 a contract was placed for 6 dump trucks at $8,155.90 each, 4 lower bids being as follows:

LeBlonde-Schact, $7,081.
Dempster Bros., $7,275.
General Motors Co., $7,710.20.
The Hug Co., $7,711.20.

In May 1934 a contract was placed for a White truck at $2,435.96, the low bidder being the International Co.

June 1, 1934, a contract was placed with the Fargo Co. for three Dodge trucks at $1,095 each, whereas the bids of the low bidders on similar trucks ran from $773.50 to $996.91. In this case the contract was awarded to the seventh high bidder.

Twenty-two items of purchases, aggregating $24,312.66, were awarded on the basis of "superior quality and personal opinion", the largest item being the General Cable Co., $8,676.77.

Mr. President, by what authority does any corporation or person representing the United States purchase property for the United States with the taxpayers' money on "superior quality and personal opinion"?

In the audit on page 10 appear 12 items purchased on faulty specifications, amounting to $21,751.18.

On page 212 of the audit there are recorded details of 35 purchases made without competition, aggregating $29,841, the largest purchase being from the H. H. Robertson Co., $14,959.35.

Now we come to one of the contracts by negotiation, a contract not made according to the statute.

On page 213 of the audit there is a reference to a payment to Research Corporation under contract of October 10, 1933, on cost-plus-5-percent basis, in connection with blast-furnace and phosphoric-acid equipment work. This, according to the Comptroller General, lacks supporting papers, the payments to June 30, 1934, being $71,350.51. I have already referred to a contract of this character let to Stone & Webster Engineering Corporation, under which excessive payments were made in violation of the statute to which I have referred. I shall not repeat it.

On page 269 of the audit there is a reference to a contract made with the International Geophysics Co. for investigations at Norris Dam, amounting to $2,613.50, which was awarded without competition.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator refers to the statute requiring competitive bids and making other requirements in respect to the acquisition of supplies and services. I have not had the privilege of hearing all the remarks made by the Senator from Vermont. I ask him now whether he contends that the statute which he has read into the RECORD is applicable to an institution such as the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I claim that it is applicable, and that there was nothing in the charter of the Tennessee Valley Authority which placed it without the scope of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. STEIWER. Is it contended by the Comptroller General that section 3709 is applicable?

Mr. AUSTIN. The best answer I can make to that question is to quote from what the Comptroller General says upon that subject; and, with the Senator's permission, I shall now do so.

Mr. STEIWER. If I may interrupt, I shall be glad if the Senator will do that. I think the questions are of very broad importance aside from the Tennessee Valley Authority. I am constantly thinking of many other corporations which have been set up for the purpose of carrying on some of the functions of the Government of the United States. There has been in my mind for a considerable time the question of the extent to which such corporations are permitted to go without restraint, and permitted to spend money without restraint. I shall be glad if the Senator will read the Comptroller General's remarks upon that subject.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I read from the audit at page 343, as follows:

The purpose of section 3709, Revised Statutes, is to enable the Government, through competition, to secure the lowest obtainable prices and to prevent discrimination in awarding the business of the Government to private enterprise. Many purchases made by the Authority did not comply with the requirements of the statutes, and in many other cases the procedure followed tended to preclude entirely or greatly diminish the advantages intended to be obtained.

In numerous cases the vouchers show that bids were solicited, but upon examination of the files the bids could not be found. In a number of cases where bids were solicited the lowest bid was not accepted. There were also noted instances of acceptance when the specifications did not fully cover the article or material needed; where, after receipt of bids, there were negotiations with one of the bidders on quantity and quality other than as stated in the specifications; and where bids were changed after the opening, the reason or basis for such change not appearing of record.

It appears that award was made to the Pennsylvania Transformer Co. (A-56174) for certain electrical equipment and the Kennedy Van Saun Manufacturing Corporation (A-53191) for the construction of a crusher and conveyor system, when lower bids had been received and rejected.

A large number of purchases of hardware were made locally from C. M. McClung, of Knoxville, Tenn. In many instances such purchases were made without advertising or other method of soliciting bids. Frequently bids from other agencies were requested either by phone or by circularizing, but it appears that awards were almost invariably made to the McClung Co. because of alleged exigency of the service, limited source of supply, etc. Purchases from the McClung Co. ranged from $4.16 to over $11,000 per month between August 1933 and June 1934.

Mr. President, I apprehend that that answers the question propounded by the Senator from Oregon better than if I should undertake to state what the position of the Comptroller General was and is.

My own view of the statute is that it requires every contract and every sale or purchase to be made through the method of competitive bidding unless some other statute creates an exception to that statute, and in this instance I fail to find anything in the charter, in the act of 1933 creating the Tennessee Valley Authority, which constitutes an exception to the statute. Nevertheless, we see that those who have administered the business of the corporation have seen fit to construe the statute differently, and to act as if they were not under the command of the Congress of the United States.

As a matter of observation, it seems to us, looking upon the 2 years of activity of this private corporation, that it has regarded itself superior to the law, above statutes, above any necessity of adhering to a Budget, above any check upon its expenditure of the taxpayers' money, derived either through the various eleemosynary activities of the Government, or by means of the statute by which it was given the breath of life.

At this point I quote the Comptroller General as follows:

Exceptions were taken to the total amount paid—

Meaning to the total amount paid to Stone & Webster under the contract to which I referred yesterday:

Exceptions were taken to the total amount paid for many reasons, because of objection to the indefinite cost-plus contracts, violation of section 3648 Revised Statutes prohibiting advance payments, salaries paid unauthorized consultants, travel expenses and many other forms of expense items presumed to be covered by the fee, lack of performance bond, and a number of other irregular items.

I now refer to another contract made by the Tennessee Valley Authority which I think tends to show the caution which ought to be exercised by the Congress in respect to any proposed increase of its authority or amplification of its funds.

On October 20, 1933, sealed bids were opened on approximately 700 miles of cable and accessories for Norris-Wilson Dam transmission line. Nine manufacturers of copper cable submitted equal bids of $678,289.08. One bid was received from the Aluminum Co. of America, for aluminum cable, in the amount of $400,149.39.

The award was made to the Aluminum Co. of America on November 17, 1933. The original contract called for 73 miles of cable with 26 aluminum strands and 7 steel strands, the remainder to be of 36 aluminum strands and one steel. The contract contained a clause permitting the Authority within 30 days to change the number of strands.

After 318 miles of cable had been fabricated, the Authority decided to change the remainder to 26 strands of aluminum and 7 of steel. A supplemental contract for an increased price was dated November 17, 1933. The auditor reports that the impression was prevalent that the strength and conductivity of the cable was not satisfactory and that a further reenforcing process was necessary. At the close of the audit period on June 30, 1934, nothing further had developed on the subject.

In other words, with the whole range of interests involved in a great contract under the advertisements of which there were bids which rose as high as $678,000, the Authority made an entirely open contract by which it could and by which it did change the terms and the price from time to time, thereby completely nullifying that competition for which the statute calls.

Mr. President, during the consideration of this matter yesterday I alluded to the employment by the T. V. A. of certain special efforts to mold and shape the yardstick so that it would be utterly impossible for private enterprise to fit itself to the yardstick. I think I did not clearly enough state one of the methods employed in that process, namely, the special rule adopted by the Authority for the cancellation of depreciation and setting aside a reserve for it. Therefore, I now call attention to what appears in the extracts from the auditor's report, to be found at page 84 of the audit, as follows:

Despite the apparently excessive depreciated value at which the Muscle Shoals property was taken up on the books, the Authority is not using the valuation basis for depreciation, but instead is basing depreciation on the earnings from the sale of power by charging 10 percent of the gross revenue to operations as depreciation and accumulating the amount of such charges as a reserve for depreciation.

On such basis there has been husbanded to June 30, 1934, $82,618.74.

Such reserve appears to be entirely inadequate. The properties in question are depreciating in value, and if the return from operations is to be properly determined, the reasonable value of all things concerned, including depreciation of original investment, must be taken into consideration.

Assuming a very conservative rate of valuation consumption for example, 2 percent, the amount of depreciation, based upon the value at which the properties in question were capitalized by the Authority, would be approximately $1,000,000 per annum.

A larger revenue will proportionately increase the reserve for depreciation at the present 10-percent method of amortization, but to accumulate a reserve on the 10-percent plan equivalent to the amount that would be charged to depreciation on a valuation basis at 2 percent, the gross revenues would have to be more than 10 times the present amount, or about $10,000,000 per annum.

There is very little basis for assuming that revenues will ever reach such a figure.

As bearing on the pending question, I now call attention to the subject of purchases beyond the scope of the authority of T. V. A. I venture to say that no legislator who considered the original act had any idea from anything contained in the act, from the President's message, from any discussion on the floor of either House, that the act could enable this corporation to extend itself so as to increase the production of electrical energy, and to reach out and consume by purchase and merger, consolidation and otherwise, private enterprises not connected with the development of the Tennessee River. Nevertheless, there appears at page 112 of the audit material showing the following:

Purchases from Mississippi Power Co. to June 30, 1934, $850,000 which represents 52.04 percent of replacement value which was estimated to be $1,628,495 as of December 31, 1933.

I will not take the time of the Senate to read all the details, but I will call attention to the items in order that Senators may see the character of deviation from the original authority that was entered upon by this corporation with respect to this one transaction.

Generating plants, price paid, $285,133.60. The only authority granted by the original act was for this corporation to dispose of the surplus power on those enterprises which had to do with the improvement of the river for the purposes specified in the act, but now they go out and add to their productivity and purchase a generating plant which will increase the surplus and create more surplus for the future.

Mr. President, bearing upon the question of whether the Senate should proceed to the consideration of this bill it is important to know that there is evidence, unavailable to the Senate, but which will be available later—and I have been assured that it may be available within a week—tending to show improper payments on account of expenditures for travel, and so forth, including among other things, for Dr. Arthur E. Morgan, $156.92, $122.71, $42.35, $930.57, $75.99, $132.80.

A brief sketch of exceptions by the Comptroller, which appears in the audit on page 134, is as follows:

Travel and subsistence.....	$29,371.29
Purchase utility properties.....	850,743.00

Total..... 2,013,326.51

I now quote what the Comptroller General says respecting these disbursement exceptions. This is a quotation from the audit, page 134:

The nature of exceptions established consist of purchases without competition in violation of section 3709, Revised Statutes; emergency purchases unsupported by showing of emergency; modifications of specifications—

And so forth.

Mr. President, I now recall that I read this extract yesterday. I will not continue reading it. I refer Senators to the RECORD of yesterday for the completion of what the Comptroller General said was the reason why he took exception to those expenditures.

Another specification of a different character, which bears upon the care the Senate ought to exercise with respect to this proposed legislation, is found in the audit on page 293. There are listed on that page of the audit land purchases made without evidence of clear title which aggregate $215,743.71.

At page 297 of the audit appears a reference to purchases of books, and so forth, $8,615.49, and subscriptions to newspapers of $1,462.51, in violation of statutes covering such expenditures.

I now refer to that part of the audit, page 354, which deals with unauthorized disbursements made by this corporation on account of other governmental departments and agencies as of June 30, 1934: Advances to E. H. F. A., $28,167.72; advances to T. V. A. C., $7,577.62; advances to National Park Service, $747.61; advances to regional development (F. E. R. A.), $4,852.64; advances to subsistence homestead (F. E. R. A.), $831.61; advances to Civilian Conservation Corps, $1,718.37; advances to Civil Works Administration, $22,649.72; advances to War Department, $4,500; total, $71,045.39.

The Comptroller's comment thereon is as follows:

There being specific appropriations for each of the above agencies, expenditures from Tennessee Valley Authority funds are unauthorized and should be recovered, along with other similar disbursements.

Now, as bearing upon whether we should proceed to consider this amendment designed to implement this private corporation with greater power and more ability to do that thing which they call "making a yardstick", I think the Senate should consider the uneconomic, unbusinesslike way in which that corporation has, in its brief experience, dealt with a certain other item of its business. I refer to the construction of houses at an expenditure of approximately $5,000 each, some of them less, some of them more, which will house people who work on the construction for the period of the construction but which will constitute, in a few years, a deserted village, for we are informed that the operation of the plant will not require more than 20 men after it shall have been completed.

At page 365 of the audit the Comptroller General states:

No permanent record was kept of accrued rentals and other charges for houses at Norris and Wheeler town sites, nor was there any properly authorized schedule of rates. The following tabulation shows incomplete costs of several houses and charges for rent, water, heat, and light in effect as of July 1, 1934:

No. 1—

That is no. 1 house, used for an example—

cost to June 30, 1934, $7,433.49.

How much rent do they charge for the use of that house?

Twenty dollars. Water rent is $1; light and heat, $5; total, $26.

Example no. 2: House cost to June 30, 1934, $7,111.16; rent, $16; water, $1; light and heat, $4; total, $21.

Example 3: House cost to June 30, 1934, $7,579.95; rent, $20; water, $1; light and heat, $5; total, $26.

Example 4: House cost to June 30, 1934, $15,589.13; rent, $30; water, $1; light and heat, $7; total, $38.

Example 5: House cost to June 30, 1934, $12,623.37; rent, $30; water, $1; light and heat, $7; total, $38.

The Comptroller General's comment about this matter is as follows:

The above costs do not include incomplete grading, landscaping, and so forth, nor proportions of the general administrative overhead.

It will be noted that while the cost of house no. 4 is twice that of 1, 2, and 3, the rent, and so forth, are not in the same proportion. The income from rentals is only between 2 and 3 percent of the cost, exclusive of maintenance and depreciation charges.

Similar data were not available at Norris, where distribution of incomplete costs was kept by group and types of houses.

Mr. President, how did they deal with the rental of personal property? I call attention to the subject of passenger automobiles and light trucks, referred to in the audit on page 366.

There is invested in passenger automobiles and light trucks $161,795.87, classified as follows: Buicks 4, Chevrolets 122, Chryslers 1, Plymouths 88, Dodges 1, Fords 4, Studebakers 1; ambulances 2; total 223.

Operating cost of cars and pick-up trucks was 4.89 cents per mile, a total of $79,811.61. The charges to various projects and activities aggregated $126,434.90, or an overdistribution of $46,623.29.

At page 367 of the audit appear facts showing the abuse of the use of rented cars.

The abuse of rented car use is shown by an example where, January 15-17, 1934, E. E. Neukom drove a hired car to Muscle Shoals from Knoxville, and returned, a distance of 694 miles, the hire being $34.70, which, with gas and oil, made the cost to the Government about $45. The round-trip fare by train would have been but $11.10 plus $5 for Pullman space.

In one period—this is not a quotation—in one period checked by the auditor for the Comptroller General it appeared that while 53 T. V. A.-owned cars were driven less than 1,000 miles, rented cars in the same period were operated a distance of 114,007 miles at a cost of an average around 7 cents per mile; but there is this quoted from the audit, as follows:

A number of cases were noted where the employee used rented cars continuously for periods of 6 months and longer.

Mr. President, one almost laughs when he reads what was the current belief respecting the T. V. A. legislation at the time when it was under consideration. After considering the authority assumed and exercised by the corporation, it is a matter of absurdity to look back upon those days not so far distant when the Committee on Military Affairs of the House were telling the House in their report, and through it all the world, that the "Congress holds reins upon the Authority." I read one brief paragraph from that report, being House Document No. 15, Seventy-third Congress, first session, as follows:

The Authority cannot proceed upon a visionary and impractical program of construction. In addition to the limitations of law there will be limitations of fact. The $50,000,000 to be derived from the sale of bonds will hardly go further than build Cove Creek Dam and Dam No. 3, and make the necessary alterations to modernize the nitrate plant, to install the necessary fertilizer equipment, and to provide adequate working capital. For every other dollar that Authority may use for constructing dams it must come to Congress for appropriations. Thus Congress holds the reins upon the Authority.

Is it not a mockery to read that statement in the report in the light of the assumption of authority and power by which this private corporation extended itself in the amount of money it expended and extended itself in the scope and character of the power which it exercised? I claim, Mr. President, that this should cause legislators to pause before they proceed to the consideration of the bill in question and to make that thorough investigation a desire for which these facts which I have brought to the attention of the Senate would naturally excite in the mind of any rational person.

Mr. President, there is no doubt that the Authority at that time understood the limitations in the law and realized that it did not have power to expand its activities and increase its capital without coming back to Congress. I prove that by reading from an article by Dr. A. E. Morgan, as follows:

When in June the Congress and the President set up the Tennessee Valley Authority the general purpose of the act comprehended such a social goal, but it was generally defined and slightly provided for. Most of the present appropriation is for specific work to build dams, transmission lines, and fertilizer plants. The law provided that the President may from time to time "outline his plans to Congress and request further funds."

Bureaucracy has a wonderful capacity for expansion. There is the germ of growth in its very nature. When we take from the normal and orderly agency of the Government authority given to it by the people and transfer that authority to a bureaucracy, what happens? Unless the activity of the bureaucracy is absolutely curbed and is held really within the reins held by Congress, it does what this bureaucracy has done. It has visions; it enters upon experiments; it reaches out into all sorts of collateral enterprises outside of and beyond the purposes of its creation. Thus we find this bureaucracy speaking of itself later, on page 2 of its report to Congress on January 3, 1934, as follows:

In carrying out its statutory duties with respect to the development of the Tennessee River for navigation and flood control, and to promote the national defense, the Authority is constructing additional dams. As a byproduct of these dams, additional hydro-electricity will be produced. The duty of the board to dispose of this additional surplus power is of the same character as the duty above described with respect to the existing surplus power now being developed at Wilson Dam.

Thus from one step they proceed to another step. To how many dams will this project be extended? If the Senate should refuse to adopt the pending motion and should consider the activities of this agency and bureaucracy, I believe it would find in the program a number out of all proportion to that which was considered, to that which was represented when the original Authority was created. I believe I shall be able to show that to be so before I take my seat.

At this point it seems relevant to call attention to the sections of the original act which limited the authority and power of this corporation.

Section 22 of the original act is as follows:

* * * The President is hereby authorized, by such means or methods as he may deem proper within the limits of appropriations made therefor by Congress, to make such surveys of and general plans for said Tennessee Basin and adjoining territory as may be useful to the Congress and to the several States in guiding and controlling the extent, sequence, and nature of development that may be equitably and economically advanced through the expenditure of public funds, or through the guidance or control of public authority, all for the general purpose of fostering an orderly and proper physical, economic, and social development of said areas.

Section 23 is as follows:

The President shall, from time to time, as the work provided for in the preceding section progresses, recommend to Congress such legislation as he deems proper to carry out the general purposes stated in said section, and for the especial purpose of bringing about in said Tennessee drainage basin and adjoining territory in conformity with said general purposes (1) the maximum amount of flood control; (2) the maximum development of said Tennessee River for navigation purposes; (3) the maximum generation of electric power consistent with flood control and navigation; (4) the proper use of marginal lands; (5) the proper method of reforestation of all lands in said drainage basin suitable for reforestation; and (6) the economic and social well-being of the people living in said river basin.

Mr. President, does that statute authorize the President of the United States to construct additional dams? Does it authorize the President of the United States to adopt additional plans? Not so. It authorizes the President to submit to the Congress such plans, and to give the representatives of the people of the United States a fair opportunity to consider them before they shall be adopted. Now, when we are about to consider whether we shall proceed to act upon an amendment of the original statute, which will extend the power and increase the appropriation, should we not carry out the original intent of Congress, as well as the obvious interest of the people, and insist upon a consideration of the plan? If the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska represents a plan suggested by the President of the United States, should we take it without consideration and rush it through, or should we pause and carefully study it, and know what it involves in cost to the people in all ways—in direct taxation, and in indirect taxation, and in loss, and in lowering the standard of living, and in obstructing the recovery of the United States of America from the depression?

What is the program? The country is entitled to know. What is the purpose of this amendment? The people of the United States are entitled to know. Certainly those who devote their time here to attempting to protect the interests and promote the general welfare of the people are entitled to know what is the program. There is no hearing—there is no report—from which we can learn that.

Yesterday I made the statement that the cost thus far had equaled approximately $159,000,000, and that the program as nearly as it can be calculated from the sums of money involved thus far would equal five times that originally contemplated, or approximately $250,000,000. That is seen by reference to the fact that the first appropriation made by Congress, outside of the $50,000,000 authorized to be obtained by bonds, was $50,000,000. There was allotted, out of F. E. R. A. funds, $25,000,000. Then came the bond issue of $50,000,000. Now comes the Budget estimate of $57,000,000. There is the authorized credit of $10,000,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. There is the subsidizing of an auxiliary corporation to the extent of a million dollars. There is the subsidy to another corporation of $300,000. Now comes this amendment, which would add another $50,000,000. Thus, we see that, whatever this program may be, it involves approximately five times as much money as the original program; and yet we are asked to adopt it, not knowing what it is, not considering what it is, not having anyone speak who can speak with knowledge of the facts regarding it before we act, and all under the representation that it is not a matter of very great importance.

At this point, Mr. President, I call attention to something which occurred in the committee of the House touching this program. Dr. Morgan, being on the witness stand, was interrogated by Representative Bacon as follows:

Mr. BACON. Carrying out all the recommendations of the President and everybody else, what will the total cost be in the next 10 years—$400,000,000?

Dr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. BACON. Will it be $600,000,000? When you get through with everything, in 10 or 15 years, what will the total cost be?

Dr. MORGAN. That is a question that does not mean anything.

Dr. Morgan then read into the record the President's message to Congress asking the creation of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. BACON. Taking all that for granted, * * * what is the total cost going to be for the Federal Government?

Dr. MORGAN. In figuring on the total cost, it will depend upon the wish of Congress from year to year concerning that development. * * * There are a dozen other sites which, if in 15 years from now we run short of power, could be utilized and we could come back and ask, "What about these?" * * * There are possibilities of many water-power plants on the Tennessee River and its branches. Twenty or 30 dams would be required to completely develop the resources of the Tennessee River.

Mr. President, what is this legislation that we are asked to proceed to consider? Toward what is it a step? What does it impose as a burden upon the taxpayers of the United States of America? If it be but a step in a huge development intended to reach out from the Tennessee River to all other rivers in the United States, let us know. We desire to consider that aspect before we take this step. Are not the people of the United States entitled to such information? Is not the Senate of the United States bound to ascertain it before acting?

So far as we can ascertain, the program has already been expanded to the following extent: Norris Dam, one-third completed, $34,000,000; Wheeler Dam, one-half completed, $38,000,000; Pickwick Dam, just started, never authorized, $22,000,000; Hiwassee Dam, $13,000,000; French Broad Dam, $30,000,000; Aurora Dam, $42,000,000; total, $175,000,000.

Still we must have in our consciousness the statement of Dr. Morgan: "20 or 30 dams would be required to completely develop the resources of the Tennessee River."

Do they mean to develop 20 or 30 more dams? The people of the United States want that question answered. The Senate of the United States ought to have that question answered before it proceeds to the consideration of a bill which would increase the authorization by $50,000,000, and increase the power of this corporation to take property of the private citizen; to rule over municipal corporations, which would much prefer to operate their own electrical production according to their special knowledge of local circumstances, but which they cannot do if this amendment is adopted, for all of them would bow the knee to this giant Authority down there.

What is the amendment? Would it absolutely foreclose and bar out forever any group of citizens in the five States involved from developing a dam and a power plant on the Tennessee River? That is for a committee of the Senate to consider. It is a serious question. My opinion upon it is of little weight, but I gain from a reading of the bill that that is precisely what it would do—that it would drive private individuals off the river under the claim that it is done in the national defense; that its primary purpose is increasing the navigability of that river.

What do we see? Is the War Department consulted? Not at all. Is the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate consulted? Not at all.

Mr. President, I have taken more time of the Senate than I had intended to take, and yet I have not finished all that might be said regarding facts. I have done little arguing. I have stated on the record what appeared to be true as a matter of experience and of history, taken from the best authority I have available, namely, the audit of the Comptroller General. There is other authority which will be available if we do not act hastily here in the Senate and vote to proceed with this bill before we have access to the printed record of the hearings already had. Perhaps we may find it our duty to hold further hearings before we proceed to act upon this proposal.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to proceed with an explanation of the bill which I am seeking to have taken up, but I want the Senate to hear me.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRAZIER in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

JAY STREET TERMINAL, NEW YORK

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 563) for the relief of the Jay Street Terminal, New York, which was, on page 1, line 9, after the figures "1929", to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. COPELAND. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY LAW

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1616) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory and supplementary thereto, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert:

That subsection (b), as amended and supplemented, of section 4 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Any natural person, except a wage earner or a farmer, any unincorporated company, and any moneyed business, or commercial corporation (except a municipal, railroad, insurance or banking corporation, or a building-and-loan association) owing debts to the amount of $1,000 or over, may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon default or an impartial trial, and shall be subject to the provisions and entitled to the benefits of this act.

"The bankruptcy of a corporation or association shall not release its officers, directors, or stockholders, as such, from any liability under the laws of a State or Territory or of the United States."

SEC. 2. That subsection (1) of section 74 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended and supplemented, is amended to read as follows:

"(1) If (1) the debtor shall fail to comply with any of the terms required of him for the protection of and indemnity against loss by the estate; or (2) the debtor has failed to make the required deposit in case of a composition; or (3) the debtor's proposal has not been accepted by the creditors; or (4) confirmation has been denied; or (5) without sufficient reason the debtor defaults in any payment required to be made under the terms of an extension proposal when the court has retained jurisdiction of the debtor or his property, the court may appoint the trustee nominated by the creditors at the first meeting, and if the creditors shall have failed to so nominate may appoint any other qualified person as trustee to liquidate the estate. The court shall in addition adjudge the debtor a bankrupt if satisfied that he commenced or prolonged the proceeding for the purpose of delaying creditors and avoiding an adjudication in bankruptcy, or if the confirmation of his proposal has been denied. No order of liquidation or adjudication shall be entered in any proceeding under this section instituted by or against a wage earner or a farmer unless the wage earner or farmer consents.

SEC. 3. That subsection (r) of section 75 of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended and supplemented, is amended to read as follows:

"(r) For the purposes of this section, section 4 (b), and section 74, the term 'farmer' includes not only an individual who is primarily bona fide personally engaged in producing products of the soil but also any individual who is primarily bona fide personally engaged in dairy farming, the production of poultry or livestock, or the production of poultry products or livestock products in their unmanufactured state, or the principal part of whose income is derived from any one or more of the foregoing operations, and includes the personal representative of a deceased farmer; and a farmer shall be deemed a resident of any county in which such operations occur."

Mr. HATCH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico indicate what the amendment is?

Mr. HATCH. I will gladly do so. This is the bill which amends the Bankruptcy Act to permit livestock raisers to take advantage of that act. In the House the act was amended so as to include, in addition to livestock raisers, poultry raisers, dairymen, and others engaged in similar lines. The amendment is immaterial, as I view it. The bill enlarges the definition of the word "farmer", which has been restricted by the courts in some instances.

Mr. KING. It simply puts certain categories of employment under the definition of "farmer."

Mr. HATCH. Yes, Mr. President; it puts under that term certain categories which should rightfully belong under the term "farmer", and we had all thought they were comprised under that term originally.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the House amendment.

The amendment of the House was concurred in.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. NORRIS to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2357) to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope Senators will remain long enough to give me an opportunity to explain the purposes of the bill. The debate which has taken place in the filibuster against the motion to take up the bill has not, in my judgment, touched the merits of the question involved in this particular proposed legislation. I venture the opinion that even though a Senator may be opposed to the T. V. A. Act and opposed to all T. V. A. activities, yet if he believes that the T. V. A. ought to be given a square deal, he will vote in favor of this bill. I have the greatest of respect for those who do not agree with the present law and who were opposed to its enactment, but it seems to me that any man who wishes to be fair, even though he is opposed to that law, should desire that the law and those enforcing it be given a fair and honest opportunity, and if we shall find a place in the law where there is an "i" which is not dotted, that even though Senators are opposed to the law, they would be in favor of dotting that "i" and let the law be given a fair trial. That is all this bill does. It does nothing else.

I shall read the bill, section by section, and let the Senate, in some instances, see just where the amended part comes into the law which is now on the statute books. This is the first section:

That subdivision (1) of section 4 of the act—

The beginning of section 4—and I am reading from the law—is as follows:

Except as otherwise specifically provided in this act, the Corporation (a) shall have succession in its corporate name.

Then follow provisions under (b), (c), (d), and so on, down to (i).

The first section of the bill amends subdivision (1) by adding the following proviso to it:

Provided, That nothing contained herein or elsewhere in this act shall be construed to deprive the corporation of the rights conferred by the act of February 26, 1931 (46 Stat. 1422, ch. 307, secs. 1 to 5, inclusive), as now compiled in section 258a to 258e, inclusive, of title 40 of the United States Code.

That act referred to is the general law of the United States applying to condemnation proceedings on the part of the United States or any of its instrumentalities. In the Tennessee Valley Act there is provision for a method of condemnation. In fact, subparagraph (i), to which this language is added, provides:

(i) Shall have power to acquire real estate for the construction of dams, reservoirs, transmission lines, power houses, and other structures, and navigation projects at any point along the Tennessee River, or any of its tributaries, and in the event that the owner or owners of such property shall fail and refuse to sell to the corporation at a price deemed fair and reasonable by the board, then the corporation may proceed to exercise the right of eminent domain, and to condemn all property that it deems necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act, and all such condemnation proceedings shall be had pursuant to the provisions and requirements hereinafter specified, with reference to any and all condemnation proceedings.

It simply permits this board to operate under the general law that applies to the United States and all corporations and all subdivisions of the United States. Is there anybody who can object to that? Is that a serious thing? Are Senators alarmed about that amendment? After they have listened for 2 days to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], are they frightened at the idea that if this corporation is allowed to condemn property, which it has to take in the name of the United States, it is to have the right to rely upon the general condemnation statutes of the United States? Mr. President, to ask the question is to answer it. I cannot see how any man, with reason, can object to that amendment. It is one of the amendments which enlarge the authority; but is that going to engulf us into all the trouble and difficulty described by the Senator from Vermont? Now, that is section 1. Let us take up section 2 and read that. It provides:

That subdivision (j) of said section 4 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

Now that proposes to strike out subdivision (j), as it exists in the present law, and to write a new subdivision (j). Let us find subdivision (j) in the original act and see what it is proposed to strike out. Here is subdivision (j):

(j) Shall have power to construct dams, reservoirs, power houses, power structures, transmission lines, navigation projects, and incidental works in the Tennessee River and its tributaries, and to unite the various power installations into one or more systems by transmission lines.

That is the present law. We propose to strike that out by section 2 of this bill and to insert a new subdivision (j), and Senators will find that it is almost identical with the present law when I read it, which I shall now do:

Shall have power to construct such dams and reservoirs in the Tennessee River and its tributaries as, in conjunction—

This is new language—

as, in conjunction with Wilson Dam and Norris, Wheeler, and Pickwick Landing Dams, now under construction, will provide a 9-foot channel in the said river and maintain a water supply for the same from Knoxville to its mouth, and will best serve to promote navigation of the Tennessee River and its tributaries and control destructive flood waters in the Tennessee and Mississippi Rivers drainage basins; and shall have power—

This language is now in the law—and shall have power to acquire or construct power houses, power structures, transmission lines, navigation projects, and incidental works in the Tennessee River and its tributaries, and to unite the various power installations into one or more systems by transmission lines.

Practically the only thing which is new, the only language which the bill puts into the law that is not now there, is that it shall be the aim of the Corporation to make the Tennessee River navigable from Knoxville to its mouth.

Queer as it may seem, Mr. President, while we debated the T. V. A. Act for about 12 years, off and on, it was never once suggested, so far as I remember, that we should provide in the proposed act the depth for navigation. We did provide for navigation; that is the principal object of the original act; we provided that the river should be made navigable, but nowhere did we say what its depth for navigation should be.

The T. V. A. officers, the two Drs. Morgan and Mr. Lillenthal, who have been denounced in, I think, almost shameful terms on the floor of the Senate, where they cannot be heard in their own defense, discovered at once that if they were going to have a system under which the Tennessee River should be made navigable, as the law provided, they should know how deep the channel to be provided should be. So this amendment is here.

The only thing, it seems to me, that is subject to a possible dispute in connection with this amendment is whether a depth of 9 feet is the proper depth or whether the depth should be 8 feet or whether it should be 10 feet. The amendment suggests 9 feet. I do not see how any other controversy can be involved in the amendment. Where is the man who wants to object to it? Can the Senator from Vermont, with his vast experience in trying power lawsuits, demonstrate that there is any particular danger to civilization and to the prosperity of the world if we adopt this amendment?

It may be said that the amendment proposes to enlarge their authority. I do not care whether it does or not. The authority ought to be conferred; it ought to have been in the original act; and the first men to point it out are these, in the mind of the Senator from Vermont, disreputable creatures who are robbing the Government of all its money. We ought to give them credit at least for making one good suggestion. How are they to build dams on this river if they do not have a plan and are not enabled to know how deep the navigable channel should be? Unless that question be decided, to start with, they are likely to encounter all kinds of difficulty when they undertake to build navigation dams. If this provision shall be put into effect, it will mean that the Tennessee River will be made navigable to a depth of 9 feet from Knoxville to its mouth. What is wrong about that? Who is kicking about it? Nobody but the Power Trust; that is all; nobody else. Everyone who wants to be constructive, it seems to me, must favor it. No one who wants to give the Tennessee Valley Authority a square deal can object to it.

The T. V. A. says to Congress, "Here is the Tennessee River; if we build a navigation dam here just below, it may be that navigation will only have a channel of 2 feet; it may not be deep enough. If the Congress has a policy to make the channel 9 feet deep, we will have to build that dam farther down." So in the general plan that is necessary to develop the Tennessee River according to the real intent and purpose of the law, this amendment ought to be agreed to, and I do not know of anyone who can possibly object to it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. KING. I was wondering if the Senator does not construe section (j) in the original act to give the authority to construct dams and improve the navigability of the river even though a channel 9 feet deep should be called for? For instance, the original section reads:

Shall have power to construct dams, reservoirs, power houses, power structures, transmission lines, navigation projects, and incidental works in the Tennessee River and its tributaries.

It seems to me that a proper construction of that language, particularly taking into consideration the title of the bill, "to improve navigability and to provide for flood control, and so forth", would give the authority to improve the river to a depth of 8 feet or 9 feet or to whatever depth was required.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator and I agree with him. I think they have the authority now, but suppose they undertook to exercise it and holding companies should come along, through an astute attorney, from Vermont, perhaps, and get an injunction and say, "The authority is not in the law; you must make it plainer." That is what is happening now in the Tennessee Valley.

The Senator must realize, while it may be impossible—and I believe it will be impossible—to prevent injunction suits, that the enemies of this project have no regard for fairness or for anything else, and if they can make a case on paper, even though it will be reversed in the higher courts, they can get an injunction. I will speak of the damage that comes from that situation a little later on. So what is the objection to the amendment?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it seems to me—and I propound the inquiry for information—that the amendment which the Senator is discussing must have some other purpose in view than that which is involved in the deepening of the channel to 9 feet.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, what, for instance?

Mr. KING. I was wondering what other provision is found in the amendment which the Senator regards as necessary?

Mr. NORRIS. The other language, or practically all of it, is now in the law; it is already embraced in the provision of the act which the Senator has read. The T. V. A. has authority "to construct dams, reservoirs, power houses, power structures, transmission lines, navigation projects, and incidental works", and so forth; but the act nowhere says how deep the navigable channel shall be.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator; at least as I interpret it, there could be no injunction and no objection to a development of the navigability of the stream even if the depth were made 9 feet or 10 feet. So I was just wondering if there was some other purpose sought by this amendment, because it seems to me that, if it deals only with the question of deepening the channel, the authority exists in the act itself.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so, I will say to the Senator, and I think so about some of the other amendments proposed by the pending bill. As I stated in my report on the bill, which has been condemned and criticized by the Senator from Vermont, none of these amendments were absolutely necessary, though they were all desirable; but the only reason why some of them were put in the bill is to satisfy some of the critical, power-minded men who were hunting courts all over the Tennessee Valley in which to obtain injunctions to restrain operations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. In any event, there cannot possibly be any objection to making these powers so specific and so plain that anybody may determine what they are.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; even a judge.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether he regards the language I am about to read in the proposed amendment as an addition to the authority granted in the original act?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me have the language before me.

Mr. KING. It reads:

And shall have power to acquire or construct power houses, power structures, transmission lines—

And so forth. Does the Senator regard the original act as giving authority to carry out the provision to construct transmission lines?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, I do; although one of the objections made in the great injunction suit now pending against the Authority is that the Authority have no authority to do that. Let me say to the Senator that the authority to build transmission lines was one of the most vital points in conference between the Senate and the House when the original bill was under consideration. We even went over from one session of Congress to another with the bill in conference because some of the conferees would not agree to give to the Authority the right to build transmission lines. I held then, as I hold now, that if we had not given the power to build transmission lines it would in effect have nullified the whole act, and I should not have cared for it at all if that authority had not been given.

Mr. KING. Was not the opinion of Judge Grubb grounded upon the proposition that the act, as it was being interpreted and carried into effect, made the United States the proprietor, in the sense in which that term is used, of certain proprietary interests, and therefore it was not within the constitutional authority of Congress to set up a corporation and engage in activities which were private in their character and belonged to private corporations and private industry rather than to the Federal Government.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall not now put that construction on Judge Grubb's decision, but I have no objection to that construction as he saw it, and the Senator may have stated it correctly. I would not want to state that that was the effect and the entire effect of his injunction, because if I did so, and there was anything wrong with it, the power companies would immediately have a fit, and I would be accused of doing something that was discourteous to the court and that was wrong in effect.

We are now finished with section 2, and I do not find anyone objecting to the language of the amendments proposed to that section. I do not see any danger so far. Let us take up section 3 and see what it provides:

SEC. 3. That said section 4 of said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding a new subdivision, (k), at the end of said section as follows—

This is a new amendment. Senators will remember what that section provided. It enumerated the powers which the Corporation should have. The amendment proposes to add another power, as follows:

(k) At any time before the expiration of 5 years from the date when this section, as amended, becomes law (the Authority) may, in the name of and as agent for the United States and subject to the approval of the President, dispose of any of such real property as in the judgment of the Board may be no longer necessary in carrying out the purposes of this act.

The original act did not give this authority except in a limited way and as to certain property. It did not give to the Board the right to dispose of real estate. It did give the right to dispose of personal property. The Board has found that in buying land which will be flooded, for instance, at Norris Dam, they are sometimes obliged to buy a piece of land which will be partially overflowed and partially not affected. In the settlement of the question the Board sometimes acquires title to land outside of the reservoir or close to it for which it has no use. There is other real estate which it may acquire in the same way for which it has no use.

If they could get the consent of the President and the land were no longer useful in the operation of the property, then they could sell it. Should anybody object to that? Is there anything wrong about that? Is there any robbery in it? Are the poor fellows who work and toil and sweat to earn their living going to lose their jobs on account of that? It is simply a business proposition and nothing else. I cannot possibly see how the most critical power attorney can find fault with anything of that kind.

Let us go on to section 4 and see what crime that proposes to commit. It reads:

SEC. 4. That subdivision (c) of section 5 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows.

Now let us go to subdivision (c) of section 5 of the original act and see how it reads:

The board is hereby authorized—

Then it enumerates certain powers (a), (b), and (c), the latter being the one we are proposing to change by this amendment. Let me read it as it is in the present law.

(c) To cooperate with National, State, district, or county experimental stations or demonstration farms for the use of new forms of fertilizer or fertilizer practices during the initial or experimental period of their introduction.

That is amended by striking it out and inserting a new subsection (c) as follows—and I ask Senators to listen and notice the similarity:

(c) To cooperate with National, State, district, or county experimental stations or demonstration farms, with farmers, landowners, and associations of farmers or landowners—

That is new language; otherwise the provision is just the same. In other words, it is explicitly stated that the Board shall have the right to cooperate with associations of farmers. It is not so provided in the original act. I think they would have the power to do it under the general powers given them. I have no doubt whatever of it, but it must be remembered that we are not dealing with honest men. If there is anything corrupt in American life today, it is the Power Trust, and they will take advantage of everything which they think leaves a crevice for them to creep into. Therefore, we propose to specifically provide for it in the law.

I continue reading:

With farmers, landowners, and associations of farmers or landowners, for the use of new forms of fertilizer or fertilizer practices during the initial or experimental period of their introduction, and for promoting the prevention of soil erosion by the use of fertilizers and otherwise.

That latter phrase is new language. Do we want to give them that authority? They think they have it now. I think they have it under the several general provisions of the law. They are now doing that kind of work, but in view of their experiences with the enemies who are piling up injunction suits one after the other for the purpose of handicapping them, for the purpose of interfering with them, the Board thought that because the original act does not contain the language "for promoting the prevention of soil erosion by the use of fertilizers and otherwise", they might be led into another injunction suit. That is what they are afraid of. They are greatly alarmed over the possibility that they cannot turn over their hands without an injunction being issued against them; and a shrewd lawyer like the lawyer from Vermont, for instance, can draw a good case on paper for injunctions to prevent almost anything on earth.

There have been found in some places in the Tennessee Valley large acreages which have been eroded, where the timber was cut off years ago, where the slope is steep, and where, as a result of the rains and the drainage of hundreds of years, the soil has been washed away. I have seen pictures of such places. Some of them are still small. Some of them are as large as an ordinary creek. A man could not drive over them. Some of them a man could not climb over on foot without great difficulty. The soil that God put there has been washing away for 50 years or more, for a hundred years; and we in this generation are now learning that one of the things our civilization must do is to prevent erosion, or in the end our civilization will fail.

Go to China and see the thousands of acres there that have been devastated because the timber has been cut off, because of erosion on side hills that has destroyed the fertility of the soil. The officials of the Tennessee Valley Authority are now engaged in that kind of work down there, and they are spending a good deal of money to do it. We are engaged in doing similar work in Nebraska. It is being done in a great many other States throughout the Union. The country is becoming alive to the fact that one of the things which in years to come will destroy the civilization of those who come after us is erosion, and the officials of the Tennessee Valley Authority are trying to stop erosion. They will fail many times. They will fail in a good many cases. They will sometimes lose their money. We know that in advance. When they lose a dollar, we shall have some attorney standing up in the Senate who thinks more of a holding company than he does of his country, and saying, "We must not have that kind of civilization. We must not spend money to prevent erosion. We must let the soil wash into the sea, and see our grandchildren go from their homes of today, because they will be desolate, into other countries if they can reach them."

If we do not believe in trying to stop erosion, we ought not to have this provision in the bill; but there is no reason why we should try to stop erosion in Nebraska and not stop it in Tennessee, Alabama, North Carolina, or Mississippi. That is all this amendment does. Does anybody object to it? Is there anything sinful about it? Is there anything to be ashamed of? Is the Senator from Vermont justified in denouncing me because I said in the report that for the preservation of the T. V. A. none of these amendments is absolutely necessary, but they are all desirable?

The T. V. A. can continue to operate if we prevent them from remedying soil erosion; but the fear is that some Federal judge will issue an injunction preventing the use of Federal money to save the country by preventing erosion. Does any Senator wish to strike out this provision? Is any one opposed to it? Can any Senator rise on the floor of the Senate and say it is wrong?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that just a few weeks ago, on April 8, 1935, the joint resolution providing money for relief and work relief became a law; and that joint resolution, among other things, provides a fund of $350,000,000 in part to do away with soil erosion.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senate, by act of Congress, is committed to the very activity for which provision is made in this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course we are. If we had courts and attorneys and enemies who were fair, we should not need this amendment. I think any enlightened judge who lives in the present state of civilization and is not chained to a post that was driven into the Constitution 200 years ago would hold that the T. V. A. had this authority even without this bill; but for the purpose of meeting just that kind of a possible contingency the members of the Board thought there ought to be in the law a direct statement of their authority.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand these amendments, there is really nothing new in any of them. The thought of the Senator so far as he has gone and so far as I have heard him is that these are simply clarifying amendments, so that the intention of the original act may be carried out?

Mr. NORRIS. Absolutely. I think the Senator states the matter correctly.

Mr. TYDINGS. Whether the proposition, in its inception, was a good thing or a bad thing is not the point here involved.

Mr. NORRIS. Absolutely not.

Mr. TYDINGS. We have a certain project, and as I understand, now that it is partly built, the Senator is asking that the project be completed.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. There is no new authority in this bill, broadly speaking, to encompass any aim which the original act did not encompass. Is that correct?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Maryland has stated the whole matter in a nutshell, much better than I could state it. If we favor this bill, it does not mean that we also favored the passage of the Tennessee Valley Act, as I said at the beginning; but if a Senator is fair-minded, even though he was opposed to the original Tennessee Valley Act, does he desire to say, "I wish to frustrate its activities indirectly by such things as narrow construction of some power that may be in the original act, that the Senate thought was lodged there, and that ought to be there"?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield again to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not very familiar with the proposed legislation, and perhaps my questions would be answered if I had studied the bill. With that apology, may I ask the Senator if the bill contains a provision that existing transmission lines, now owned by private companies, may be purchased by the Authority so as to extend the scope of its operations?

Mr. NORRIS. No; that is already in the act in almost direct language.

Mr. TYDINGS. The reason why I ask that question is that, as the Senator may recall, my original objection to the act was not based so much upon its idealism, or what it sought to accomplish; but I took the position that if the Government were to parallel private lines there perhaps might be a confiscation of a company where there had been an honest attempt to render a service at a fair price. Perhaps that day has gone by.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think it has. The Tennessee Valley Authority can buy existing lines, and we put that into the law, although it is included in one of the amendments in order to make the power more explicit.

Mr. TYDINGS. I mention that only by way of explanation of the fact that the project in itself now being in a state of near completion, there really are no new rights given under these amendments. They are simply clarifying amendments to carry out the original intent.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Now let us consider section 5 and see what crime is committed there.

That said act—

That means the Tennessee Valley Act—

be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding a new section after section 9 of said act, as follows.

This is new. Let us read it, and see what terrible black crime is covered up beneath its dubious words:

Sec. 9a. The Board is hereby directed in the operation of any dam or reservoir in its possession and control, to regulate the stream flow primarily for the purposes of promoting navigation and controlling floods. So far as may be consistent with such purposes, the Board is authorized to provide and operate facilities for the generation of electric energy at any such dam, for the use of the corporation and for the use of the United States or any agency thereof, and the Board is further authorized, whenever an opportunity is afforded, to provide and operate facilities for the generation of electric energy in order to avoid the waste of water power, to market such power as in this act provided, and, thereby, so far as may be practicable, to assist in liquidating the cost or aid in the maintenance of the projects of the Authority.

Personally, I do not think that is necessary. I think that is all in the original act, every bit of it; but again come the injunctions. In the great injunction which was issued by Judge Grubb, I understand there was some reference to this subject. As I read that injunction, if it shall be sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, we might just as well blow up every dam, not only in the Tennessee River but every dam in the United States. There was something said in the injunction, however, about its being constitutional, and yet that no legislative authority had been given to sell power. In effect, the judge held that if a dam were built under the navigation power given by the Constitution, and incidentally some water power could be developed there, the United States had a right to develop the water power for the Government's use, but if it developed any more than the Government could use, it must let it run to waste and not sell it.

I do not believe that is in the act as it now stands. I cannot see any possibility of putting that kind of a construction on the act. I do not believe any reasonable man can put such a construction on it. When we have built a dam for navigation, and it is 100 feet high, if by putting in a wheel we may develop 100,000 horsepower, which is an immense amount of power, it is ridiculous to say that we dare not do it because there is no constitutional authority for the Government to go into the power business; its authority is confined to navigation.

If we take that view, we might just as well repeal the Tennessee Valley Act, we might just as well repeal the Boulder Dam Act, and every other water-power act we have ever passed, and blow up all the dams.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Referring to Judge Grubb's decision, he held the whole thing unconstitutional, did he not?

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is the effect of the decision.

Mr. LONG. If his opinion is good, the proposed grant of water power would not be any better, would it?

Mr. NORRIS. I think that if his decision stands, there is no possibility of any of them surviving. But there was something, I think in the opinion itself—and I have not read the opinion for some time—to this effect, "Rather than go beyond your constitutional authority, let the power go to waste." No other conclusion can be drawn from it.

The section to which I am referring states in so many words that they shall have authority to sell the surplus power according to the terms laid down in the act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I hastily read the opinion, the finding of facts, and the conclusions of law of Judge Grubb. I do not pretend that in that very hasty perusal I have accurately appraised the decision which he rendered, or the points which he attempted to cover, but as I read the decision, I was impressed with the thought that what he was driving at was that the Federal Government is one of enumerated powers, that among the powers granted to the Federal Government was not one which would authorize it to engage in the manufacture and sale of electricity, or power, particularly in competition with private enterprises, and destroy them, or to engage in an activity which would be confiscatory, of course, as to private interests and private property which had been acquired. Therefore, he held that the injunction should issue, for the reason that it appeared from the testimony that the primary purpose of T. V. A. was not so much the building of reservoirs for irrigation purposes, but was the establishing of industrial plants to generate power, to erect transmission lines, and to invade fields which had been occupied by private endeavor, where lines had been constructed, and where the public was being served by electrical energy. That was the point. As to whether he was right or wrong, I express no opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. I lay it down as a proposition which I do not believe any lawyer will dispute, that where the Constitution gives authority to Congress to do a certain thing and it does it, and in doing it necessarily there is produced something else which there is no constitutional authority to produce, it will have the right, nevertheless, to provide what shall be done with that byproduct, in the way of sale or other disposition.

The dissenting opinion written by Chief Justice Hughes in the railroad-insurance decision contains a very illuminating paragraph on that subject. He cites the report of a commission composed of Senators and others, of which Senator Sutherland, now Justice Sutherland, of the Supreme Court, was chairman; and Justice Sutherland was on the other side in the Supreme Court on this particular question. It was stated in the report of that commission in so many words that where authority is given to perform a certain act which is admitted to be constitutional, if, in the exercise of that authority, something is produced or made which had not been in contemplation, instead of throwing it away, there would be authority to save it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. I say here that certainly nobody will contend that Congress has not the right to legislate respecting the navigability of the Tennessee River, and we have authorized a corporation representing the Government of the United States to improve the navigability of the Tennessee River. The law provides that they shall bring about maximum navigability. In carrying out that provision they build dams, and when they build dams they produce power. The production of power naturally follows a constitutional activity, and it follows, therefore, that they can dispose of that power, and they can transmit it, if the power is in the form of electricity.

Suppose that in the building of this great dam, instead of producing power, by some operation of nature we produced bread. Would anybody hold that because the Constitution did not say anything about our producing bread we would have to throw that bread away, that we would have to guard it so that even dogs could not eat it, that we would have to be sure it went to waste? Is not a child in the eighth grade in school capable of coming to a better conclusion than that, even though a great lawyer, representing great holding companies, may hold that to be true?

It seems to me that in all reason such a foolish, narrow-minded construction sought to be put upon the Constitution of the United States is not tenable.

I now yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. My impression is that in its control of public land the Government has frequently entered into contracts not only for the cutting of timber, but for the sale of and royalties on turpentine extracted from timber.

Mr. NORRIS. The books are full of such instances.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. In part I agree with what the Senator has said. Perhaps the action in the case of the Roosevelt Dam in Arizona will illustrate the point which I think Judge Grubb had in mind, and the one which I now have in mind.

A question arose when the Roosevelt Dam was constructed in Arizona by the Government for the reclamation largely of its own lands, and of course there is no question about the power of the Government, under the authority to dispose of the public domain granted by the Constitution, to utilize waters which have not been appropriated for the purpose of putting them out on lands which it owns for the purpose of selling them. Before the construction of the Roosevelt Dam the farmers in the vicinity and those who acquired lands made contracts with the Government to take the water as soon as the dam was constructed. It soon developed that power would be developed as a result of the construction of the dam, and the paramount purpose being to build the dam for irrigation purposes, the question arose as to whether or not the ancillary development, when the power was created, could be used by the Government.

I held, because the question was referred to me at that time by some persons who wanted suit instituted, that the Government had the right to develop the power and to sell it; but, in view of the fact that it had made a contract to sell the water to the people in the valley there, I insisted that when the power was developed and when the dam was turned over, all the rights originating from the manufactured power should also pass to the farmers. There is no question, however, of the right of the Government to utilize the power.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the law authorizes the construction of a dam or dams for the purpose of promoting navigation. Unquestionably Congress has that power; it can take steps to promote navigation or to improve navigation by building dams. The production of power is merely incidental, not the original purpose of building the dam.

Now something is to be developed incidental to navigation, incidental to the construction of the dams, and the amendment provides that the T. V. A. will have authority to sell the power.

May I ask the Senator whether the authority to sell the power carries with it the authority to distribute the power?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; the T. V. A. has explicit authority to build transmission lines.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is given that authority?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; not by the proposed amendment, but there is that explicit authority in the present law.

Mr. FLETCHER. In the amendment there is mention of the sale of power. I was wondering whether the Government would be confined by that to the selling of the power itself without having any authority to transmit it. There might be a question there, because under the original Muscle Shoals legislation, as I remember, the Government did sell power. It did not transmit the power, but it sold the power.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me read the language of the amendment to the Senator. It reads: "To avoid waste of water power, to market such power as in this act provided."

The act provides in rather minute detail what shall be done. For instance, it gives preference to farmer organizations; it gives preference to States and counties to purchase the power; it provides for the transmission. It reads: "To market such power as in this act provided." Suppose we add, in line 12, after the word "market", the words "and transmit", so as to read: "to market and transmit such power as in this act provided."

When we get the bill before the Senate—if we ever do, and if the power companies will let us alone long enough to do so—such an amendment will be offered, if the Senator does not offer it, and I think it will improve the bill.

If some of those, such as the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], for instance, think there may be some doubt about the authority to sell this power—and I think that doubt was in the mind of Judge Grubb when he said there was no direct authority contained in the act to dispose of the power which was purchased—do we want to give to the T. V. A. the authority to sell the surplus power? Is there any Senator who will say "nay" to that proposition? If Senators do not want to sell the surplus power, but want it to go to waste, then they should be opposed to this amendment. If they do want to give the Tennessee Valley Authority power to sell it, then this amendment ought to be adopted. In my own opinion, they have the authority now without the adoption of this amendment, although apparently Judge Grubb did not think so.

We will now pass on to section 6. I have not found anything bad as yet. I should be glad if any Senator thinks he has seen something sinful or wrong or criminal in any provision we have so far considered, to rise in his place and say so. I do not believe anyone can even assert that sort of a claim.

Sec. 6. That section 10 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto a proviso as follows.

Let us now go to section 10 of the act and see where it comes into the picture. Section 10 authorizes the board to sell the surplus power not used in its operations, and so forth. It is unnecessary to read it. It is a rather long section. Section 6, the amendment which I will now read, adds a proviso to that section, as follows:

Provided further, That the Board is authorized to include in any contract for the sale of power such terms and conditions, including resale rate schedules, and to provide for such rules and regulations as in its judgment may be necessary or desirable for carrying out the purposes of this act, and in case the purchaser shall fail to comply with any such terms and conditions, or violate any such rules and regulations, said contract may provide that it shall be voidable at the election of the Board: Provided further, That in order to supply farms and small villages with electric power directly from its transmission lines as contemplated by this section, the Board in its discretion shall have power to acquire existing transmission lines and facilities: And provided further, That the terms "States", "counties", and "municipalities" as used in this act shall be construed to include the public agencies of any of them unless the context requires a different construction.

Let me tell the Senate what I believe to be the reason why that amendment is offered. In the first place, it is the theory of the Tennessee Valley Act to carry the benefits of cheaper electricity, so far as provision for electricity is made in the act, to the consumer of electricity, and not have it eaten up by middlemen. We have gone so far in that act as to provide that wherever a sale of electric energy is made to a person or a corporation which intends to resell it for a profit, the Board has a right to cancel the contract if the reasonable regulations of the Board as to the price which the consumer shall be charged are not complied with.

A certain condition was found early in the administration of the act. There was a town—I will not name it—which was going to take electricity from the T. V. A. The leaders of the town organized. They had a machine entirely set up to divide a number of fat offices among themselves at very large salaries. It was perfectly evident to the Board that one of the purposes these men had in mind was to feather their own nests, and the Board required of them before the contract sale was made that the price to the consumer should not exceed a certain amount; that in fixing the rate there should be taken into consideration a sum equal to the tax paid by a private concern engaged in the same business; that they should provide also for a reasonable percentage to be set aside to take care of wear and tear; and that there should be a provision against payment of fabulous salaries in the municipality for the handling of the business.

In connection with the contracts which the Board has made it has done just what the proposed bill gives specific authority to do. There was some question raised whether the Board had the right to do what it has done. The Senator from Vermont has raised one objection to this bill, and only one, in addition to the one just mentioned. He raised objection to the section under which he said municipalities were going to be controlled in the matter of the rates they would charge. He said that whatever they wanted to charge and whatever they wanted to pay was their own matter.

The Corporation took the position that the object of Congress in passing this law—and it is stated in the act—was to help the consumer, was to give preference even to the home owner over the manufacturer. It is provided in the law that if there should ever arise a case where both could not be supplied the home owner should have preference. The purpose of the law was that the T. V. A. should go into the homes and give the people cheaper electricity. The T. V. A. concluded that it had the authority to see that sales should be so made that there should be no abuse.

Do Senators desire to give the Board that authority? Is that a good thing? That is all this bill provides for. It provides for nothing else. I think the Board now has the authority. But, again, some bright holding-company lawyer may make use of the allegation that T. V. A. has no such authority as a loophole in order to obtain an injunction and destroy the benefits of the act for an entire community or city.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. If the Senator has answered the questions I intend to ask, I do not want to bother him to do so again. I will look at the Record. The Senator from Vermont in his speech yesterday and today mentioned the setting up of a number of Delaware corporations, one of them to engage in the regulation of diet, or the development of a proper diet.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that I have not answered that point. I will answer it, but I have not come to that point as yet. I should rather not take it up until I complete my presentation of the sections of the bill.

Mr. COUZENS. Then I will not press the question. The other question is what justification there is for setting up a company to sell electrical equipment on the installment plan. Does the Senator from Nebraska justify that?

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is a good thing, and I am going to discuss it. However, that matter is not involved in this bill. Neither is the other question which the Senator has asked. This bill has nothing to do with that. The practice will not be prevented if the bill is passed. It will go on just the same if the bill is not passed.

Mr. COUZENS. If the theory is to continue along this line, the question arises in my mind whether that power should not be taken away from the T. V. A. by Congress, irrespective of whether it is contained in this particular bill or not.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be right. I will not argue that question now. Perhaps the President ought not to set up these various corporations. He has done so all over the United States. Perhaps he could have done it in some other way. Perhaps somebody else could have done it better. However, that is not involved in this bill. I wish to call to the attention of the Senator that this bill has nothing whatever to do with that question.

Let me now take up section 7. Sections 7, 8, and 9, I think, are the ones to which the Senator from Vermont referred so much.

Section 7 provides:

That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding a new section after section 12 of said act, as follows:

"Sec. 12a"—

This is a new section. Permit me to read it and see what sin, what dark crime, it covers up.

"Sec. 12a. In order (1) to make possible the disposition of the surplus power of the corporation according to the policies set forth in this act; (2) to give effect to the priority herein accorded to States, counties, municipalities, and nonprofit organizations in the purchase of such power by enabling them to acquire facilities for the distribution of such power; and (3) at the same time to preserve existing distribution facilities as going concerns and avoid duplication of such facilities, the Board is authorized to acquire, within transmission distance from any dam where such power is generated by the corporation (a) existing distribution facilities and incidental works, including generating plants, and (b) interconnecting transmission lines, or to acquire any interest in such facilities, incidental works, and lines, and to dispose of them to States, counties, municipalities, and nonprofit organizations. No such distribution facilities and incidental works, or interest therein, shall be acquired by the Board unless in its judgment it shall appear practicable so to dispose of the same. It shall be the duty of the Board to use all reasonable diligence to negotiate contracts upon such terms and conditions as in its judgment may be reasonable, just, and equitable, with States, counties, municipalities, and nonprofit organizations for the transfer to them of distribution facilities, incidental works, or any interest therein acquired by the Board, and for the sale of surplus power of the Corporation for distribution through such facilities. If at the expiration of 5 years from the date of the acquisition of any such distribution facilities, incidental works, or interest therein, the Board shall have found it impracticable or inadvisable to make the transfer herein contemplated, it shall make a full report of the facts to the Congress of the United States, together with such recommendations as it may deem appropriate. Pending such transfer, the Board is authorized to operate, maintain, and improve such facilities and incidental works for the sale and distribution of electricity and to make such contracts, rules, and regulations in connection with such sale and distribution as in its judgment may be reasonable, just, and equitable."

Mr. President, we ought to consider together that section and the section later on which provides for the issuance of $100,000,000 of bonds. However, first let me take up section 7 and state to the Senate what is its object and why it is in the bill.

Suppose a private corporation owns transmission and distributing lines to several municipalities, five or six of them, we will say, and one of those municipalities should desire to construct a municipal distributing system, and not to buy the existing one but to buy power from the T. V. A. The objection is immediately made—and I concede there might be such a possibility, though I think it is always exaggerated—that if there be taken out of the private system this municipality or that municipality, it would injure the entire system, that securities issued on the entire system would be affected, and that the investors might thereby lose something of their investment if the system were injured by acquiring one unit and not taking them all. One municipality could not take them all; no municipality could take more than would be necessary for the service of its own people. Municipality A could not buy a municipal system in town B, of course. So in such a case this section gives authority to the T. V. A. to buy the whole system, then to sell it to the municipality, and if the T. V. A. take the whole system and have an arrangement with town A to take one part of it and another arrangement with some other town to take another part of it, they can operate the system until they secure arrangement thus to sell the entire system, but if they fail to dispose of the entire system within 5 years they must report to Congress the facts and secure advice from Congress as to what it is proper to do.

That provision, let me say to the Senate, will never be put into effect unless the holding companies, which are so precious in the estimation of my friend, make that kind of contract of sale. There is no provision for condemnation proceedings in this section. The T. V. A. cannot take such a system by condemnation; they can only take it if the owners of the system wish to sell it and at a price that is agreeable to them. That is the object of that section.

It may be, though it shall be embodied in the law, that it will never become effective; if they all take the viewpoint that the Senator from Vermont does, it never will take effect.

However, the cry is made, the propaganda is sent out, that the dear "widows and orphans" will be losing their investment, and T. V. A. will be blamed for it. This is to save them if any of them are in danger; this is designed as much to protect the private-utility investor as it is anyone else, and it will never become effective unless the investor in the private utilities voluntarily makes the contract of sale.

Is there anything bad about that? Is anybody going to be hurt by it? Can the private-utility interests be hurt? They do not need to enter into that kind of contract; it is not provided that they shall; but here we are face to face with a national propaganda of unusual dimensions, trying to make the Senate, the House, and the people of the country believe that we are trying to rob the investor. If there is any danger in what they say is dangerous, this is to save them from it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The practical working of this section would mean that, for instance, if a private company has a lighting system in a certain city and has spent $12,000,000 on that system and there is that much value there, and, we will say, it is represented by $9,000,000 of bonds and $3,000,000 of stock, then those who have put their money in it may, if the property is there, get a return of their money?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the purpose of it. It seems to me it is exceedingly fair; and I cannot imagine how anyone who wants to be fair can object to a just provision of that kind.

Mr. NORRIS. A little later I will refer to that again when I come to the bond provision.

Now, Mr. President, let us proceed to section 8. Senators, keep your ears open! The terrible crime of this bill has been pictured for 2 days by the Senator from Vermont; you have not found anything bad in it as yet; now see if you cannot find something wrong with section 8. That section reads as follows:

SEC. 8. That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding to section 14 of said act the following:

This is something new; it is not in the present law. Let us see what a terrible thing it is. Here it is:

For the purpose of accumulating data useful to the Congress in the formulation of legislative policy in matters relating to the generation, transmission, and distribution of electric energy and to the Federal Power Commission and other Federal and State agencies, and to the public, the Board shall keep complete accounts of its costs of generation, transmission, and distribution of electric energy and shall keep a complete account of the total cost of generating, transmission, and distribution facilities constructed or otherwise acquired by the corporation and a description of the major components of such costs according to a classification of accounts adopted by the Board, together with records of such other physical data and operating statistics as may be helpful in determining the actual cost and value of services, and the practices, methods, facilities, equipment, appliances, and standards and sizes, types, location, and geographical and economic integration of plants and systems best suited to promote the public interest, efficiency, and the wider and more economical use of electric energy. Such data shall be reported to the Congress by the Board from time to time with appropriate analyses and recommendations, and, so far as practicable, shall be made available to the Federal Power Commission and other Federal and State agencies which may be concerned with the administration of legislation relating to the generation, transmission, or distribution of electric energy.

Where is the sin in that amendment? Where is the covered-up crime there? Do we want that information? It is something entirely new and not in the original act. Do we want this information transmitted to the Power Commission, to the Congress, to the municipalities, and to the public generally so that we may know all about the generation and the transmission of electricity, so that we may all know about the costs of appliances which now are often very fabulous?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Does not the Senator believe there ought to be a provision that they should be subject to the audit and control of the Comptroller General?

Mr. NORRIS. A general audit and control of the Comptroller General is now provided for in the act itself.

Mr. COUZENS. It does not apply apparently to that particular language.

Mr. NORRIS. I should think it would. If it does not, and the Senator wants to offer that kind of amendment, I should be glad to accept it. I have not anything to cover up here. I have not any more interest in this legislation than has any other Senator. I am not guilty of trying to deceive the Senate, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] tried to induce Senators to believe I am. I am just now engaged in going over the bill itself to see what is wrong; to see if anybody can find anything wrong with it. I welcome that kind of amendment, although I think it is entirely unnecessary. Here is what the law now provides:

The Comptroller General of the United States shall audit the transaction of the corporation at such times as he shall determine.

I should think that would cover everything. There should be an audit, and I should be glad to have their accounts and transactions audited, but I think the authority is now amply sufficient. Who objects to that provision? What is wrong about it? Can the Senator from Vermont find some complaint with that language?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I had not intended to interrupt the Senator, but the point as to that particular amendment is that it empowers the Board to adopt the kind of bookkeeping it sees fit, and it does not require the Board to comply with the standard forms of bookkeeping required of ordinary public utilities. By means of that amendment this particular corporation has an escape from the standards of capitalization and other valuations upon which the supervisory commission, the Public Utilities Commission, is enabled to compare one with another and ascertain whether rates are too high, as well as other essential facts which bear upon the rights and privileges of individuals. That is what is the matter with the amendment. It is the element in the amendment which makes the Board the ultimate authority as to the type of accounting which shall be employed with respect to these matters.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose it would suit the Senator from Vermont better if we should provide in the bill that these accounts should be kept by the New England Power Association and its subsidiaries. It would suit the Senator better to have some private company establish its methods of measuring than to have the Authority do it. The entire thing would be gone over by the Comptroller General's Office to see that there was not anything wrong about it. I do not know why I should not prefer the method of keeping books prescribed by the Authority to the method of bookkeeping followed by the holding companies.

If I am not mistaken, there is now in the general law—and I have not any objection to incorporating it in this bill—a provision that the General Accounting Office shall have the right to supervise and see that the books are kept according to rules and regulations laid down by the General Accounting Office.

Mr. COUZENS and Mr. AUSTIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. I was going to suggest, in order to have accounts uniform with the accounts kept by the Power Commission, that the section might be amended so the system of bookkeeping would have to be approved by the Federal Power Commission. That would bring about uniformity of accounts.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. I have no objection to that. That is another suggestion that might be considered good. I do not want to give the power to some private company to establish the bookkeeping system, but I would rather have the books kept in accordance with the methods by which books are kept by the Federal Power Commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I invite the attention of the Senator to the provision in the amendment that—

Analyses and recommendations, so far as practicable, shall be made available to the Federal Power Commission and other Federal and State agencies which may be concerned with the administration of legislation relating to the generation, transmission, or distribution of electric energy.

That provision of the amendment puts the analyses and recommendations in the hands of experts, certainly, and if there is anything wrong with them the Federal Power Commission and State agencies will discover it.

Mr. COUZENS. The trouble with what the Senator from Tennessee suggests is that there ought to be a uniform system of calculating depreciation, amortization, and obsolescence. If we are going to make this a yardstick, as I am in favor of making it, there should not be one percentage of depreciation and obsolescence for one plant and another percentage of depreciation and obsolescence for another plant. That does not make a yardstick for keeping the operations comparable.

Mr. NORRIS. I have never heard any complaint about the methods of keeping cost accounts by the T. V. A. If Senators would rather the Comptroller General should outline something of that kind, I do not know that I should object; but I would rather have the Power Commission do it than the Comptroller General. They know more about it. I would have no objection to the Power Commission doing it, because they are experts in that line. Certainly we ought to have the same system for all governmental activities. There is no doubt about that.

But suppose we do not have this section? Suppose we strike it out of the bill? Do Senators want to do that? Let me read it:

For the purpose of accumulating data useful to the Congress in the formulation of legislative policy in matters relating to the generation, transmission, and distribution of electric energy and to the Federal Power Commission and other Federal and State agencies, and to the public, the Board shall keep complete accounts of its costs of generation, transmission, and distribution of electric energy and shall keep a complete account of the total cost of generating, transmission, and distribution facilities constructed or otherwise acquired by the corporation—

And so forth. Do Senators object to securing that kind of information? Is that a bad thing to have? Who is better qualified to furnish it than is this board? No instrumentality on earth would have the facilities to give such information.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. I should like to say that in listening to the Senator read the section I heard no reference to uniformity of calculating obsolescence, depreciation, and replacement, which are ordinarily a very great factor in arriving at cost of production. It does not make any particular difference what the percentage is. The important thing is to have it uniform if we are going to create a yardstick. What I do not want is the authority in that section to be used by an agency that itself is interested in making a fine showing. I want some independent agency to fix the yardstick for depreciation, obsolescence, and replacement, so they shall all be treated on the same basis. There is not a word in the section relating thereto.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. Let us strike out the whole section.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no I do not want to do that. I want the information, but I want it reliable when I get it.

Mr. NORRIS. What would the Senator suggest? Who should be given the authority to make the accounting? How would the Senator suggest we amend it?

Mr. COUZENS. I should say that the basis of creating the percentages of obsolescence, depreciation, and replacement, should be uniform throughout the industry.

Mr. NORRIS. How can we make it uniform?

Mr. COUZENS. By inquiry, investigation, and so on. In other words, I do not want to have one agency which is itself charged with the responsibility of creating a yardstick to be responsible for its own figures.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, but I do not understand what authority we have to fix the bookkeeping method for some other system unless the Government owns it. I was about to say that we cannot go out and tell a private company what method of bookkeeping it shall use; but I suppose we can do so in the case of a public utility, and we often do.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. I have just been spending hours and hours and days and days on the new holding-company bill, by which it is proposed to turn over certain prerogatives to the Securities Commission and to the Power Commission, and give them certain jurisdictions. In cooperation with those agencies, a uniformity of method can be arrived at, so that we may have a true yardstick, and not a false yardstick.

Mr. NORRIS. If this part of the bill is not right, I should like to have someone suggest an amendment to improve it and make it right.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was about to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that if any Senator has a helpful amendment which will make this bill carry out its purpose in a more effective way, I am quite sure the Senator from Nebraska will be willing to accept such an amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall be glad to get it. I am just as anxious as anybody can be to have a system that is as nearly perfect as we can make it. I have no other interest in the matter, and I shall welcome that kind of a suggestion. I confess I do not see at the moment just how I would go about preparing such an amendment unless I should say:

For the purpose of accumulating data useful to the Congress in the formulation of legislative policy in matters relating to the generation, transmission, and distribution of electrical energy—

Then strike out—and to the Federal Power Commission and other Federal and State agencies, and to the public, the Board shall keep—

Instead of that, how would it do to say?—

The Federal Power Commission shall keep—

And so forth.

Mr. COUZENS. May I suggest that I have not had time to prepare an amendment, but I think some amendment ought to be made. As the Senator knows, the Internal Revenue Bureau fixes a uniform allowance for depreciation for all classes of industry. If this bill were amended so as to provide that the usual allowance of credits for depreciation and obsolescence permitted by the Bureau of Internal Revenue should be applied in computing those figures, that would insure uniformity.

Mr. NORRIS. The Internal Revenue Bureau now has such a system, has it?

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes.

LXXIX—455

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the Senator from Michigan if he will not ascertain from the Bureau what that system is, or consult with their experts and bring in an amendment to that effect.

Mr. COUZENS. I shall try to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall be glad to have it go into the bill.

Mr. President, we now come to section 9. That is the section which is bitterly assailed; and I will say to the Senate that we must consider that section in connection with the new section 12 (a), found in section 7 of the bill. They must both go together.

This is section 9:

That section 15 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

That strikes out a whole section that is in existing law. It will be found on page 10 of the existing law. In my judgment, this particular amendment is the only one which has been seriously attacked by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Therefore, I shall now take the time to read the section in the law that will be amended by including section 15, as amended, in section 9 of the bill.

The law now reads as follows:

SEC. 15. In the construction of any future dam, steam plant, or other facility, to be used in whole or in part for the generation or transmission of electric power the Board is hereby authorized and empowered to issue on the credit of the United States and to sell serial bonds not exceeding $50,000,000 in amount, having a maturity not more than 50 years from the date of issue thereof, and bearing interest not exceeding 3½ percent per annum. Said bonds shall be issued and sold in amounts and prices approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, but all such bonds as may be so issued and sold shall have equal rank. None of said bonds shall be sold below par, and no fee, commission, or compensation whatever shall be paid to any person, firm, or corporation for handling, negotiating the sale, or selling the said bonds. All of such bonds so issued and sold shall have all the rights and privileges accorded by law to Panama Canal bonds, authorized by section 8 of the act of June 28, 1902 (ch. 1302), as amended by the act of December 21, 1905 (ch. 3, sec. 1, 34 Stat. 5), as now compiled in section 743 of title 31 of the United States Code. All funds derived from the sale of such bonds shall be paid over to the corporation.

That is the law now. Senators, please note: Those bonds can be issued only for specific purposes. See what they are:

In the construction of any future dam, steam plant, or other facility, to be used in whole or in part for the generation or transmission of electric power the Board is authorized—

To issue bonds. By this amendment that section is stricken out, and in place of it we have the amendment which I will now read. It is section 9 of the bill. While it is lengthy, it has been attacked, and I think I ought to read it all. I do so also in order that I may not be accused, as I have been, of not doing my duty in writing the report on this bill, of trying to deceive somebody, trying to fool somebody, trying to make them believe to be true something which is not true.

SEC. 15. With the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the corporation is authorized to issue bonds not to exceed in the aggregate $100,000,000 outstanding at any one time, which bonds may be sold by the corporation to obtain funds for acquiring any property which may be acquired under section 12 (a) of this act; or exchanged as hereinafter provided, in order to acquire any property which may be acquired under said section 12 (a). Such bonds shall be in such forms and denominations, shall mature within such periods not more than 50 years from the date of their issue, may be redeemable at the option of the corporation before maturity in such manner as may be stipulated therein, shall bear such rates of interest not exceeding 3½ percent per annum, shall be subject to such terms and conditions, shall be issued in such manner and amount, and sold at such prices, or exchanged for such property or such interest in property, including stocks, bonds, or other securities, as may be prescribed by the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That such bonds shall not be sold or exchanged at such prices or on such terms as to afford an investment yield to the holders in excess of 3½ percent per annum: Provided further, That such bonds shall be exchanged for property only at a price or on terms which in the judgment of the Board is fair and equitable. Such bonds shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed, both as to interest and principal, by the United States, and such guaranty shall be expressed on the face thereof, and such bonds shall be lawful investments, and may be accepted as security, for all fiduciary, trust, and public funds, the investment or deposit of which shall be under the authority or control of the United States or any officer or officers thereof. In the event that the corporation should not pay upon demand, when due, the principal of, or interest on, such bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the holder the amount thereof, which is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and thereupon to the extent of the amount so paid the Secretary of the Treasury shall succeed to all the rights of the holders of such bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is authorized to purchase any bonds issued hereunder, and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of the corporation's bonds hereunder. The Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time, sell any of the bonds of the corporation acquired by him under this section. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of the bonds of the corporation shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States. With the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the corporation shall have power to purchase such bonds in the open market at any time and at any price. No bonds shall be issued hereunder to provide funds or bonds necessary for the performance of any proposed contract negotiated by the corporation under the authority of section 12 (a) of this act until the proposed contract shall have been submitted to the Federal Power Commission, and the said Commission shall have found that the consideration stipulated therein to be paid or exchanged by the corporation for any property or interest therein is not excessive. When any such proposed contract shall have been submitted to the said Commission, the matter shall be given precedence and shall be in every way expedited and the Commission's determination of the matter shall be final. The authority of the corporation to issue bonds hereunder shall expire at the end of 5 years from the date when this section as amended herein becomes law, except that such bonds may be issued at any time after the expiration of said period to provide bonds or funds necessary for the performance of any contract for the acquisition of property entered into by the corporation, prior to the expiration of said period, under the authority of section 12 (a) of this act.

There are the present act and the proposed amendment, one of them providing for $50,000,000 of bonds, the money to be used only for the purpose of the construction of dams, or similar things. That is the one purpose for which the money raised by the sale of bonds can now be used under the law. The proposed amendment takes that authority entirely away, and provides only one reason for which bonds may be issued; and that is, to carry out a contract made under section 12 (a), which I explained a few moments ago.

Mr. President, this power would disappear in 5 years. The power to issue bonds now granted in the law would not disappear in 5 years. The Senate did not get that idea from the discussion by the Senator from Vermont. He left the impression that there was no such thing as a 5-year limit. He used expressions which conveyed the idea that these bonds could be issued at any time so long as the law stood. Such is not the case. The Senator did not read the section, and did not convey the idea as to which Senators who were asking him questions about it desired to obtain information. He covered it up. He was not fair with the Senate. He did not give Senators a fair understanding of what the section provided, and those who heard him must know that they had a wrong impression after they had heard him.

While I have been opposed, and was opposed originally, to the section providing for the issuance of $50,000,000 of bonds, and was opposed to the whole bond proposal, this is a great improvement to the provision of existing law. I doubt very much whether there ever will be a bond issued under this proposed law, if it shall be enacted. There never will be unless under section 12 (a) the Tennessee Valley Authority shall make a contract with some holding company which owns a rather large system for generating and transmitting electricity. If they do not want to make that kind of a contract, then there never will be a bond issued. That is all the bonds can be issued for.

While the Board would have a hundred million instead of fifty million, the limitation would be 5 years; and the bonds could not be issued for the building of dams, or the building of transmission lines, or anything of that kind.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Is it contemplated that these bonds will be paid out of the earnings of the properties purchased?

Mr. NORRIS. The contemplation is, I will say to the Senator, that the properties purchased will not be held by the Authority. They will sell them, and they will not make a deal under section 12 (a) unless they have good reason to believe that they can sell a good portion of the power.

Mr. COUZENS. As I heard the Senator read the section, there is no requirement that the moneys which are to be used for the purpose there mentioned will be used, when returned, for the retirement of the bonds. Is there such a provision?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think there is such a provision in express terms. Does the Senator refer to the income from the properties?

Mr. COUZENS. Does not the Senator think that the law itself ought to require that, if the T. V. A. continues the operation of the property or sells the property acquired under the sale of these bonds, the revenue should be used to retire the bonds?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, I do; I have no doubt of it.

Mr. COUZENS. There is no provision in the bill to that effect.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is pretty nearly what they would have to do. If there is any doubt about it, I would like to have an amendment offered to cover that point.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask the Senator whether he would interpret the language at the bottom of page 11, in section 10, as excluding the use of money for that purpose, namely, where it says "shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States at the end of each calendar year." That is, all the income shall be used for the purpose of maintenance, operation, depreciation, amortization, interest on bonds, all in the discretion of the Board; but, if there is any left, then it must be paid into the Treasury of the United States at the end of each calendar year, and it may not be paid to retire the capital of the bonds.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not follow the Senator in his reading.

Mr. AUSTIN. I was reading at the bottom of page 11.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the Senator said page 10. That is in section 26, is it not?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not gotten to that as yet.

Mr. AUSTIN. I understand; but it is pertinent to the inquiry made by the Senator from Michigan as to whether the money could be used or would be used to retire the bonds.

Mr. NORRIS. If there is no further question about section 10, I wish to discuss it a little further.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the sole purpose of section 10 and of section 12 (a) is to provide a fund so that a power company can sell its properties to the T. V. A. and the T. V. A. may have the money to pay for them. They cannot do it now. Quite a hue and cry has been raised about damage to stockholders, should the bill remain in its present form. This would prevent damage to stockholders to the extent of the value of their property. Is not that the sole purpose of the amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it provides for the acquisition of property under section 12 (a), and the issuance of bonds under section 15 of the law. They cannot be issued for any other purpose. If property is not so acquired, then no bonds will ever be issued. If no such contract is made, section 12 (a) will never become operative, and so far as issuing bonds is concerned, the power will expire in 5 years, anyway.

When we put into a bill something which we thought would be satisfactory to the holding companies, which we thought would meet one of their objections, although we did not admit the objection was good, and are confronted with such a violent assault as has been made in the last 2 days on this section, even without a reading of the whole section, it makes me rather discouraged in trying to do anything toward getting on better terms with the holding companies than have existed in the past. When we try to do something they assault us immediately, as we have been assaulted in the Senate, charged with trying to do something that is wicked and sinful. None of the activities under section 12 (a) or under section 15, the bond-issue section, will ever be called into life unless it is with the consent of privately owned companies who want to sell their business. Is there anything wrong about that? Is that sinful; is that wrong? Who is going to be hurt by it?

Again, I say, it is not necessary for the continuation of the Tennessee Valley Authority that this bill be passed. It is just as much for the private companies that this proposal is made as for any of the activities of the T. V. A., and more so.

Now, let us go to section 10. I read:

Sec. 10. That section 26 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows.

Let us see what section 26 is. It is found on page 15 of the original law. I read:

The net proceeds derived by the Board from the sale of power and any of the products manufactured by the Corporation, after deducting the cost of operation, maintenance, depreciation, amortization, and an amount deemed by the Board as necessary to withhold as operating capital, or devoted by the Board to new construction, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States at the end of each calendar year.

By section 10 we strike that out, and in lieu insert a provision which is almost a copy of the present law. Very little change is made in it.

Section 10 provides that section 26 shall read as follows:

Sec. 26. The net proceeds for each fiscal year derived by the Board from the sale of power and any of the products manufactured by the Corporation, and from any other activities of the Corporation, including the disposition of any real or personal property—

That is new language, "including the disposition of any real or personal property." This bill would give the Board authority, with the approval of the President, which they never had before, to sell real estate which is not useful in their operations. All this does is to compel them to account for the sale, for the money received in the sale of the property. It proceeds:

After deducting the cost of operation, maintenance, depreciation, amortization, interest on bonds.

Under section 129, they may get some bonds on their hands, and they must account for the interest they receive on them. I continue reading:

And an amount deemed by the Board as necessary to withhold as operating capital, or to be devoted by the Board to new construction.

Then this new language is inserted:

Improvements, betterments, or the acquisition of facilities to carry out the purposes of this act.

Then there follows the language of the present law:

Shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States at the end of each calendar year.

Who is going to object to that? Is there anything wrong with that? It simply adds a new duty to the Board. It requires it to account for more than the present law requires it to account for. I do not see how anyone can find fault with that.

Let us now go on to the next section, section 11.

That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding after section 26 of said act a new section, as follows.

This is something new. It is not in the original act. Let me read it and see what is awfully bad about it.

Sec. 26a. The unified development of the Tennessee River system requires that no dam, appurtenant works, or other obstruction, affecting navigation, flood control, or public lands or reservations shall be constructed, and thereafter operated or maintained across, along, or in the said river or any of its tributaries until plans for such construction, operation, and maintenance shall have been submitted to and approved by the Board, and the construction, commencement of construction, operation, or maintenance of such structures without such approval is hereby prohibited. When such plans shall have been approved, deviation therefrom either before or after completion of such structures is prohibited unless the modification of such plans has previously been submitted to and approved by the Board.

Such construction, commencement of construction, maintenance, or operation of any structures or parts thereof in violation of the provisions of this section may be prevented, and the removal thereof enforced by the injunction of any district court exercising jurisdiction in any district in which such structures or parts thereof may be situated, and the corporation is hereby authorized to bring appropriate proceedings to this end.

The requirements of this section shall not be construed to be a substitute for the requirements of any other law of the United States or of any State, now in effect or hereafter enacted, but shall be in addition thereto, and any approval, license, permit, or other sanction now or hereafter required by the provision of any such law for the construction, operation, or maintenance of any structures whatever, except such as may be constructed, operated, or maintained by the corporation shall be required notwithstanding the provisions of this section.

What is wrong about that? Authority is granted by the Tennessee Valley Act to embark upon the improvement of an entire basin, the Tennessee River Valley Basin, for certain legitimate constitutional purposes. Among them is the construction of dams for the improvement of navigation and the control of flood waters, not only of the Tennessee River Basin, but of the Mississippi River Basin, and this section provides that no improvement shall be made, and no dam or structure shall be constructed which will interfere with the plan laid down by the law necessary to carry out the instructions of Congress, and that when such an improvement is attempted to be made, or when it is proposed to build a dam or any other structure, the specifications must be approved by the Board. When we pass a law to provide for the building of a dam or a bridge across a navigable stream we require that the plans therefor shall be approved by the Secretary of War. In other words, this section is provided in order to make the system complete. It seems to me it should appeal to any man that such power ought to exist, and it ought to be emphasized that if we are going to go into the Tennessee River Valley to insure the maximum amount of navigation and flood control, and the maximum amount of power consistent with flood control and navigation, then we ought to adopt this kind of amendment. I cannot see how there can possibly be any legitimate objection to it.

The next section is section 12—

That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding at the end of said act a new section, as follows.

Now, see how much evil can be found in this one. It reads:

Sec. 31. This act shall be liberally construed to carry out the purposes of Congress to provide for the disposition of and make needful rules and regulations respecting Government properties, provide for the national defense, improve navigation, control destructive floods, and promote interstate commerce and the general welfare.

I do not see how any man with any Christianity in his heart can object to that section. It is the last section of the bill.

When this bill comes up for consideration, if we can overcome the opposition of the holding companies and the Power Trust and have it considered, I shall offer two amendments, and I had better mention them now so there may be no doubt that I will not be guilty of some heinous crime by getting put through in the darkness some amendments which I had given no notice of and about which I had not told anybody. I did tell someone about one of the amendments I propose to offer. I told the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] about it. I consulted with him several times before its preparation, and he gave me some ideas about it.

At the end of line 22, on page 3, I propose to add the following:

The Board is also authorized to experiment in the production of chemicals and other modes and methods for the extermination of noxious weeds and the destruction of plants injurious to agriculture.

Then there is another amendment I shall offer, which I shall offer at the request of this Board, and I shall read that to the Senate now so Senators may know all the devilry this Board has in its mind and that the Senate may be ready to fight it when it comes up. Here is the amendment, which is drawn by the Board itself and sent to me by mail:

That section 4 of said act of May 18, 1933 (48 Stat. 58), be amended by adding a new subsection (1) as follows:

(1) Shall have power—

That means the Board—

to advise and cooperate in the readjustment of the population displaced by the construction of dams, the acquisition of reservoir areas, the protection of watersheds, the acquisition of rights-of-way, and other necessary acquisitions of land, in order to effectuate the purposes of the act; and may cooperate with Federal, State, and local agencies to that end.

Here is the letter which the chairman of the Board sent me:

The attached amendment to the Tennessee Valley Authority Act has been agreed to by the directors. If it could be added to the bill without complicating its passage, we should appreciate it.

In explanation, I would say that in moving people from the reservoirs we find many landowners and tenants who have always lived in the neighborhood and who are quite unequipped to shift for themselves without some assistance. Much hardship has resulted from the purchase of park and forest lands in this region. The small farmers selling the lands have, in a good many cases, lost their entire selling price before they could relocate. The T. V. A. is now advising and cooperating with these people who must move from the Norris Reservoir, in helping them to select suitable homes.

In a few cases where elderly tenants, who have no resources, are actually driven from their homes by high water, it may be necessary to shelter and care for them temporarily until readjustment can be made. In this progress, we desire to cooperate with the Federal relief agencies.

When the time comes, if we ever reach that time, when the filibuster shall end, and the bill be taken up for consideration, I will offer that amendment. The other amendment, which I read to the Senate, simply provides that in addition to making fertilizer and producing fertilizer ingredients, the Board shall also have power to experiment in the production of chemicals which can be used in the destruction of noxious weeds and other plants injurious to agriculture.

Mr. President, I have gone through the bill. I am now going to take up some of the charges made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. I think I shall be able to show that the Senator from Vermont was not fair with the Senate. He left impressions by what he read and what he said that the bill provides some things that it does not provide. He did not go over the bill and find fault with it except as to one section, and that was the bonding section. As I have said, the bonding section was inserted in the bill for the benefit of the Senator's clients.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I resent that insult! I rise to a question of personal privilege.

I have observed throughout the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska aspersions cast against me for which he no doubt thinks he has some justification in Martindale's Directory, which I observed him to obtain and which he now has on his desk.

I desire to say to the Senate that I am not counsel for any public utility whatever. I was counsel for various public utilities before qualifying as a United States Senator. As soon as I knew that I was likely to be a United States Senator I withdrew from that employment wholly, absolutely, and entirely. I am not counsel for any such client at the present time.

One statement made by the Senator from Nebraska I have caused to be transcribed by the official reporters because it carries the same imputation that has just been made directly:

They will sometimes lose their money. We know that in advance. When they lose a dollar we shall have some attorney standing up in the Senate, who thinks more of a holding company than he does of his country, and saying, "We must not have that kind of civilization."

Mr. President, that record in Martindale's shows that Austin & Edmunds is a firm which represents the New England Associates, or some such corporation, called by the Senator from Nebraska a "holding company", and that I am of counsel for them. I am not a member of that firm. I have never represented that firm or associated with that firm in any litigation whatever in favor of a public utility since I became a United States Senator. That is all there is to that. These statements are wholly false. These insinuations are wholly false. I want that to be known at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had not intended to read what the Senator has called attention to, but I shall have to do it now. Martindale's Directory, which I hold in my hand, is for 1935. The Senator has been a Member of the Senate for 6 or 8 years. It is queer that if he is not an attorney for these corporations which are inserted in Martindale's Directory, the directory was not corrected long ago. The directory for 1935 says:

Austin & Edmunds, 215 College Street, Burlington, Vt. WARREN R. AUSTIN, of counsel.

WARREN R. AUSTIN, of counsel! It tells where he was born, and so forth, the various offices he has held, and gives the other partners' names. Warren R. Austin, Jr., is also in the firm. Then it gives the names of the clients. This is in 1935. The Senator came to the Senate 6 years ago, as I remember.

Attorneys for New England Power Association and its subsidiaries in Vermont.

That is known to everybody who knows about power associations to be one of the large holding companies. It is not at the top or the peak, but it owns subsidiaries all over the State of Vermont. It is one of the holding companies which constitutes in the United States the Power Trust. I would not have read another thing if the Senator had not interrupted and referred to this. This gives other clients of the firm, a string of corporations, 15 or 20 of them, insurance companies, railroad companies, almost all the other kinds of corporations that one could think of, which I shall not stop now to read; but the first client of all is one of the big holding companies of the United States, the Power Trust, the New England Power Association and its subsidiaries in Vermont.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the Senator be fair enough actually to read what is stated there, instead of giving the impression that the record states that I am a member of that firm?

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; I will read the whole thing—everything. It is fine type and difficult for me to read it. I read:

Austin & Edmunds, 215 College Street, Burlington, Vt. Telephone 1307. General practice. Corporation, international law, insurance claims.

Members of firm: WARREN R. AUSTIN, of counsel, born Highgate Center, Vt., November 12, 1877; admitted to bar, 1902, Vermont. Preparatory education, University of Vermont, Ph. D.; legal education, law office of C. G. Austin, St. Albans, Vt. Fraternity, Kappa Sigma. State's attorney, Franklin County, Vt., 1904-6; mayor city of St. Albans, 1908; present United States Senator; United States commissioner, 1909-18. Member Chittenden County, Franklin County, Vermont State (president 1923), Far Eastern American, and American Bar Associations.

William H. Edmunds—

Does the Senator want me to read what it says about the other partners?

Mr. AUSTIN. Has the Senator read that statement correctly?

Mr. NORRIS. I think I have.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think the Senator is giving it an entire misinterpretation.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator like to read it and see if he can give a different impression?

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the Senator say that the statement names me as a member of the firm, as a partner in the firm, or does it state that I am of counsel?

Mr. NORRIS. It says, and I read it that way, "WARREN R. AUSTIN, of counsel", and then states where the Senator was born and states that he is now a Member of the United States Senate; and this was published in 1935.

It is embarrassing to go into this matter, but the Senator has taken it up. It seems to me it is rather peculiar that when we get into the discussion here of something pertaining to power companies, to the Power Trust, we have always run against the opposition of the Senator from Vermont; and, assuming that he is conscientious and honest in it, it is proper to look back and see what his associations were, how he grew up. His associations have become part of the man.

I have no doubt he is conscientious in his opposition to anything which would regulate a private power utility.

There took place in the State of New York an investigation of a legislator who had been charged with working with the Power Trust while he was a member of the legislature. You remember that a year or so ago the newspapers were filled with accounts of the investigation, and the evidence was taken here also by the Federal Trade Commission. The Legislature of New York made an investigation in the city of New York, and when they made that investigation they found among the files of a power magnate the letter which I am about to read. It is taken from the Washington Herald of December 19, 1934. The headline reads:

MOVE TO ALTER POWER CURB REVEALED IN AUSTIN LETTER—SENATOR URGED CHANGE IN BILL, DESPAIRING OF ITS DEFEAT

NEW YORK, December 18 (1934).—A letter written by Senator WARREN R. AUSTIN (R.), of Vermont, to the head of the New England Power Association proposing to alter the bill restricting power companies' right of appeal to Federal courts in rate cases, was revealed today in the joint legislative investigation of public utilities here.

The letter, addressed to Frank D. Comerford, president of the Association, expressed the Senator's opinion that it would be impossible to defeat the bill and that it would be "better strategy to try to amend the bill" rather than to try to kill it.

"NEUTRALIZED BILL"

"Bad effects" of the bill would be "neutralized" by his amendment, in the belief of Senator AUSTIN. His amendment proposed to throw the question of Congress' power to enact this legislation in the courts, meanwhile staying the rate order until final adjudication.

The letter was written on stationery of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Senator AUSTIN's letter was addressed to Frank D. Comerford, president of the New England Power Association, and its contents were offered to show that as a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee he had expressed his interest in modifying legislation opposed by the association.

Earlier the investigation revealed today that by means of a "stock-jobbing manipulation", the book and market values of three public utilities were increased by $82,766,357 without the addition of a single physical asset.

The letter written by Senator AUSTIN, of Vermont, follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
April 14, 1933.

FRANK D. COMERFORD, Esq.,
President New England Power Association,
Boston, Mass.

DEAR PRESIDENT COMERFORD: Answering yours of the 13th, re S. 752:

(1) The subcommittee to which this is referred consists of Senators NORRIS, STEPHENS, BLACK, VAN NUYS, and AUSTIN.
(2) The chairman of this committee—

That refers to me—

The chairman of this committee is the same person who was chairman of the committee which reported favorably S. 3234 in the Seventy-first Congress, second session, May 9, calendar day May 18, 1932.

Therefore, consideration of this matter carries the burden of that report, copy of which is enclosed herewith.

That was a report made by me, and it was good reading, too. I am glad the Senator sent it.

(3) Since the date of that report, to wit, December 28, 1932, the United States District Court for the Western District of Wisconsin, Mondovi Telephone Co. v. Public Service Commission of Wisconsin, issued a stay of proceedings designed to restrain the execution of an order of the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin, dated November 10, 1932, pending final determination in the courts of the State of Wisconsin, in which a suit had been brought and a stay order granted by the State court. This action was founded upon section 266 of the Judicial Code as amended.

And then he quotes it:

"It is further provided that if before the final hearing of such application a suit shall be brought in a court of the State having jurisdiction thereof under the laws of such State, to enforce such statute or order, accompanied by a stay in such State court of proceedings under such statute or order pending the determination of such suit by such State court, all proceedings in any court of the United States to restrain the execution of such statute or order shall be stayed pending the final determination of such suit in the courts of the State * * *"

(4) It is my intention to offer an amendment to the bill which will harmonize it with section 266, and which in my opinion will neutralize the bad effect of the proposed bill, to wit:

On page 2, line 9, strike out the period and the quotation marks and insert after the word "State": "which remedy includes the right of such public utility to a stay of such order pending final adjudication as to the repugnance of such order to the Constitution of the United States."

(5) It is my opinion that it will be impossible to defeat in the subcommittee this measure. It may be impossible to get this amendment, but it seems to me better strategy to try to amend the bill than to try to kill it.

I would appreciate your opinion regarding this matter and any facts that may be applicable to the hearing.

(6) The question of time of action on the bill is largely determined by the chairman, and, even if it were submitted to the committee, there is little likelihood of a delay until the regular session being obtained without the cooperation of a majority.

With personal regards, I am,

Very truly yours,

WARREN R. AUSTIN.

The Senator from Vermont did offer the amendment that is outlined in this letter. It was defeated. He was a member of the Judiciary Committee when the bill came up. He fought it there. He offered the amendment again, as I remember, on the floor of the Senate.

I desire to say that I was then of the opinion, and I still am, and the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], the author of the bill, also was of the opinion, that if that amendment had been agreed to it would have been a strategical killing of the bill, just as the Senator from Vermont said in this letter. It was better strategy to amend it. The amendment would have had the effect of making the bill dead. So in the committee, not only on that bill but on the other bill to which the Senator refers here, which he says the chairman reported, the Senator from Vermont—as he had a perfect right to be—was every time against any bill which regulated a public utility. He fought it in the Senate. He is fighting this bill now. That has been his record, and since he has gone into the subject, it seems to me that it is only right that that record should be known.

The Senator says he is not a member of this firm, but this book, published in 1935, gives him as "of counsel" and tells that he is a United States Senator. It is still published. I could, if it was not a violation, probably, of a confidence, which I am not going to violate, state that evidence came to me today of something else, which I will not mention unless the Senator who gave it to me volunteers the information to the Senate. That shows the tendency.

When a man has been attorney and is advertised now as of counsel for the attorneys of one of these holding companies, it does not seem to me to be ethical for him to be on the floor of the Senate arguing against the regulation of any of those corporations, or those holding companies, or those public utilities. I may be entirely wrong; I may have just old-fashioned, foolish notions, but I think it is unethical. I do not criticize him for being an attorney for these companies. He has a perfect right to be. But it ought to be outside of the Chamber, not in the Senate. It is just peculiar that it follows what he did before he came to the Senate, but every time there has been any attempt at regulation of any of these former clients he has been opposed to the regulation.

I am going to review some of the things the Senator said yesterday. Here is the reference he made to this bill, practically the only one, and he did not read the entire section. What I am going to show now is that he left an impression here that was untrue. If followed by the Senators who listened to him, they would not have had a correct idea of what the bill provided. He did not tell. He said:

Consider for just one moment that section 9 of the bill reads in part as follows:

"That section 15 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 15. With the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the corporation is authorized to issue bonds not to exceed in the aggregate $100,000,000 outstanding at any one time.

That is as far as he read. I read you that section today, and you know that the impression you get from reading those few lines which the Senator read is entirely erroneous. He left the impression that it was a permanent statute. He left the impression that they could issue these bonds for any purpose. He left the impression that it would run on forever, as long as the act remained on the statute books. You know now that that is not true. When you have read the section and heard it read, you have found that these bonds could be issued for only one specific purpose.

The Senator did not tell the Senate that in order to get these bonds issued there was required the consent of the private-power company itself. Yet that is true, as you now know, but you did not know it then. The Senator did not leave that impression with you. He left an erroneous impression against regulation of power companies of the power trust.

Let us read on. Now he is referring to me, and my sin is that I wrote a report on this bill which he did not think was full enough. I had said, in effect, that there were none of these amendments—I have not the report before me—that were absolutely necessary to enable the T. V. A. corporation to continue, but that all the amendments were desirable.

I think I have shown today that that is absolutely true. This bill may be defeated, it may be killed by the filibuster led by the Senator from Vermont in behalf of the holding companies, it may be killed, but the T. V. A. will go on. As I said in the report, the amendments are not absolutely necessary, but they are all desirable, and I have read them to the Senate today, and Senators have had an opportunity to see that there is not a wrong or a sin or any suggestion of evil in any of them.

Now the Senator is speaking of me:

"Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed", that he has grown so great that he will take into his roomy maw—

I suppose that means my mouth. [Laughter.] The Senator is better educated than I am, and if it does not mean that, he will probably tell us what it does mean—that he will take into his roomy maw $100,000,000 and regard it as a matter of no very great importance.

What is the idea he wants to convey? He wants to convey to his fellow Senators the idea that this bill provides for the issue of $100,000,000 in bonds, and that there is no limitation on it, that it can go on like the brook, forever, which he knew was not true and which you know now was not true.

Have we a right to consider that attitude in connection with the Senator's services for the Power Trust, which relationship he says he severed when he came to the Senate, although the Martindale Directory did not find it out and have not found it out yet? Whether he did or not, it seems to me his attitude in the committee and in the Senate on every one of these bills shows that as a matter of professional ethics he is disbarred from voting on or discussing any of these bills.

Let us read on. He said:

However, that is only one of the features of the bill. Let me call the Senate's attention to the fact that the whole plan of the T. V. A. comes to the Congress with a view of a limited power in the corporation to do certain definite things and then stop, unless upon an examination and report to the Congress the corporation were further authorized to proceed.

That is all he said then. He dropped that quotation. This bill provides, as he read, in the first few lines, for the issuing of a hundred million dollars of bonds. I will refer to his language further on. He said, as appears on page 7400:

Mr. President. I understand it is not correct, and that the total amount would be $100,000,000; but if the Senator will observe the language of the bill, that is an open-end mortgage. It runs to $100,000,000 at any time in the future.

What idea would you get from that—that is, to stop in 5 years, as it in fact would? No. He left you the impression that it went on through all time.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] interrupted and asked a question, and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] then said:

In answer to the question, I will say graphically and briefly that advantage has never yet been taken of the $50,000,000 authorization for a bond issue. On the contrary, the Tennessee Valley Authority—this private corporation, consisting of three persons—saw fit to take out of the Treasury of the United States, by other and devious and unauthorized means—saw fit to take out of the Treasury of the United States, by other and devious and unauthorized means, treble the amount authorized in the T. V. A. Act, and never touched the $50,000,000 really authorized by the act.

"Devious and unauthorized means"—which, I submit, is not true. There was not a dollar taken out by unauthorized means. The Senator continued—

As a matter of fact, I think it was known by everyone who had given the subject any attention that the T. V. A. had never issued a dollar in bonds. It has no bonds now outstanding, although it has had authority all the time to issue bonds to the amount of $50,000,000 for the purpose of building dams, and so forth. The Senator, in several allusions, referred sarcastically to this board because it did not issue bonds, and then, in the next breath, complained that the bill authorizes it to issue bonds; so it is pretty hard to satisfy him. It is pretty hard to satisfy any holding company to the point where it will want to see this bill passed. They kick because the Board does not issue bonds under the existing law, and kick because the proposed amendment will authorize it to issue bonds.

I ask Senators to harmonize those positions if they can. I do not think they can.
